Capitalize Chicago's Buying Habits

The bulk of department store advertising—"upstairs" and down, in the "Loop" and out of it—is available to the Chicago shopper in one medium—

THE CHICAGO DAILY NEWS.

That's convenience!

The bulk of local advertising—shop news in general—is always available in the same medium—The Chicago Daily News. That's business—capitalizing convenience!

The majority of Chicago merchants—from department store head to neighborhood grocer—prefer that the manufacturer's advertising of products they carry appear, as their own advertising does, in The Chicago Daily News. That's consistent merchandising policy.

Therefore the general advertiser who follows the lead of the department stores and local merchants in Chicago, and places his advertising in the medium that is read for necessary day by day shopping news eliminates chance in securing a reading for his copy, and obtains the dealer co-operation he needs. That medium is

MEANS JUST WHAT IT SAYS

The man who has studied business conditions knows that Ohio offers a rich field for those who have something worthwhile to sell.

It has producing farms, busy factories, splendid hardwood forests, rich petroleum, coal and natural gas fields. It has a population of 5,759,394, or 141.4 inhabitants per square mile.

OHIO'S Purchasing Power Makes It the FIRST Logical Market

Ohio has 16,125 factories, or an average of one factory for every 2.5 square miles of territory. The yearly payroll of Ohio factories amounts to $944,651,000.

There are 23,515,000 acres of farm land, mostly improved. Although this is about 90% of the state's area, yet 63% of the population lives in incorporated towns and villages, showing the intensity of Ohio's population.

Ohio farms average 91.6 acres and are worth $3,095,666,336. Nearly 180,000 farms are owned by their operators. Think what this means to the maker of farm implements.

Ohio is fifth in electric railway mileage. It is thirty-fifth in area and fourth in population.

Quarter Century Survey of Press Content Shows Demand for Facts

Remarkable Analysis of 110 Newspapers Published Now and in 1899 Indicates General Decrease in Opinion—Big Increase in Advertising Proportion—Tendency to Departmentalize Press

By PAUL W. WHITE

ANALYSIS of the contents of newspapers at both ends of the past quarter century shows some remarkable facts.

While the American newspaper of today is fundamentally unchanged in character, the past 25 years have wrought interesting revisions of editorial opinion as to proportions of interest demanded by the reading public.

The writer has just completed a survey of 110 newspapers in 63 cities, for comparison with an analysis made of the same number of newspapers in 14 cities 25 years ago by Professor D. F. Wilcox, well-known franchise and public utility expert. To make his finding Professor Wilcox classified the subject matter of more than 9,000 columns of newspaper material, while the writer has classified the subject matter of 19,200 columns.

Here is the table of percentages found by Professor Wilcox in 1899:

I. News	55.3
(a) War News	17.9
(b) General	21.8
Foreign	1.2
Politics	6.4
Crime	3.1
Miscellaneous	11.1
(c) Special	15.6
Business	8.2
Sport	5.1
Society	2.3
II. Illustrations	3.1
III. Literature	2.4
IV. Opinion	7.1
(a) Editorials	3.9
(b) Letters	3.2
V. Advertisements	32.1

Following in the paths of Professor Wilcox, the writer during spare time of 3 months, examined 19,200 columns. An effort was made to survey at least two issues of every newspaper. The results of this analysis follow:

I. News	40.5
(a) General	22.1
Miscellaneous	8.4
(b) Special	18.4
Business	7.9
Sport	7.5
Theatre	1.5
Society	0.8
Radio	0.9
II. Illustrations	5.7
III. Literature	5.3
IV. Opinion	2.7
(a) Editorials	2.2
(b) Letters	0.5
V. Advertisements	45.8
(a) Classified	14.3
(b) Display	31.5

Elsewhere on this page is presented another table wherein the percentages are reduced to columnar inches. These figures offer a competent basis for comparisons of the content of newspapers of today as compared to those of a generation ago. It must be explained before this comparison is attempted that the "war news" listed by Professor Wilcox probably referred to news concerning the negotiations concluding the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and possibly the first dispatches on the Boer War.

These figures tend to prove that though the columnar inches alloted to news of all kinds have increased, the percentage is considerably lower. This development is not surprising when one considers the tremendous growth of other departments. Then, too, the "boiling down" of news has ever been the goal of newspapers and press services so that many articles now appearing in newspapers are considered deserving of one-third the space assigned 25 years ago.

An encouraging feature of the news tables is the increase in foreign news. There is little doubt that the World War, with the United States entering into its many complexities, served as an impetus to international thought and heightened desire for news from foreign lands.

That there is not an increase in political news larger than is shown in the tables is a subject for considerable speculation. The average number of columnar inches for 1924, 166.40, is remarkably low in a presidential year, and even more so since the bruiting about of political misconduct has been placed under the heading "politics." It may be safe to assume that this finding is indicative of flagging interest in politics.

Those reformers who believe that newspaper attention to crime is somewhat instrumental in bringing about "crime waves" are possibly borne out by the rising amount of news devoted to lawlessness of all kinds. Certainly crime is given too much attention in some of the newspapers examined (particularly those on the Pacific Coast). It is interesting to note that in some of the so-called "yellow journals" surveyed, the amount of crime news was appreciably lower than in some of their more concededly respectable brethren. For instance, in issues of the same date, crime occupied 159.6 inches in the New York American; 168.2 in the Denver Post; 170.1 in the San Francisco Call; while in the New York Times, there were 180 in.; and in the Kansas City Star, 203.7.

Of miscellaneous news, the increase can be explained by the variety of subjects handled today as compared to those of a generation ago. These include, education, health, and religion, the last named of which the editor of 1899 was loth to include in his columns.

Variety of subjects is also responsible for the tremendous gains in special news. Business news, for instance, has increased largely because newspapers have employed trained financial writers, and have demanded more complete accounts of market conditions. Particularly true is this of newspapers on or near the Eastern seaboard.

The profusion of sport news is accounted for by the large number of sports now "covered," as compared to the small number of 25 years ago. Baseball, prize-fighting, and football are still predominant, of course; but tennis, golf, lacrosse, soccer, and other sports have their following, and newspapers that have attemped to slight any of these so-called "minor sports" have soon noticed a falling off in circulation.

Probably the decline in society news, a drop of nearly 100 per cent, is the most significant of all the news findings. The cause of this decline may be found in the ever-increasing population; where people become absorbed by the very size of a city, there is little likelihood that they are going to be tremendously interested in the affairs of their neighbors. This idea is brought out by the figures on the newspapers of separate cities that were surveyed in the preparation of this paper. New York, it was found, was lowest in the percentage of society news, while Chicago and Philadelphia were also far down in the list. Boston, in fact, was the only one of the first 10 cities of the United States, that carried more than the average of 20.48 inches a day.

It is probable that when Professor Wilcox made his survey he intended literature to mean the serial stories that appeared in many newspapers of the time. The writer, however, has used this generic term to cover all of the vast amount of "feature" news, most of which is syndicated; "columns," save when they are obviously editorial; serial stories; articles prepared by theologians, scientists, and other experts; and fashion notes and women's and magazine pages. Admittedly this is a diverse classification, but it is so arranged in order to show the attempts made to increase circulation by providing magazine entertainment in the daily press. More than one-twentieth of the newspaper of today (and, if cartoons and illustrations are also to be considered, one-ninth of the newspaper) is devoted to such attempts.

The elimination of individual journalism before mentioned is probably responsible for the falling off in editorial opinion. Newspapers have begun to crowd columns and other features into their editorial pages with the result that a small decrease is noticeable in the number of inches assigned to editorials, and a considerable loss in the inches formerly given over to "letters to the editor" and editorial exchanges. This elimination, or rather curtailment, of "letters to the editor," so long a medium in which Vox Populi, Constant Reader, and A Friend expressed their convictions is evidence of the lost intimacy between reader and editor.

By far the largest increase in any department of the newspaper has been in advertising. There are very few nationally known products not advertised in the newspapers, and of course local patronage has been seen to be quite dependent (in the case of large stores and shops) on newspaper advertising.

However, despite this enormous increase, one great source of advertising revenue of 1899 has been eliminated today—patent medicines and charlatans being now forbidden space.

It is evident that the business department of a newspaper has become more and more important. When one considers that in the last 25 years the circulation of daily newspapers throughout the United States has jumped approximately 15,000,000, and that the financial demands of present-day journalism have grown consistently more complex, there is seen to be ample cause for this development.

CHANGED IDEA OF WHAT PUBLIC WANTS

WITH the arbitrary selection of a 12-page, 7-column, 1680-inch newspaper as typical of the papers examined by Wilcox in 1899, and a 16-page, 8-column, 2560-inch newspaper as typical of the papers examined by the writer translated into terms of inches of space, become:

GOOD TYPOGRAPHY IN NEWSPAPER MAKING

The "Double-Truck" Probably Is the Newspaper's Most Complicated "Take"—Some Important Things to Do in Planning "Double-Trucks"—Five Specimens and Interesting Hunches Well Worth Considering

By H. FRANK SMITH

Article XIV

EDITORIAL NOTE—Mr. Smith is a special lecturer in the department of Advertising and Marketing at New York University. Newspaper typography in all its phases will be discussed in this department in the last issue of each month. Complete newspapers as well as individual items, such as headings, advertisements, editorial wages, features, etc., will be reviewed, and good and bad examples illustrated and commented upon. Publishers, editors, advertisers and readers are invited and urged to send in specimens and to take full advantage of the author's desire to help them with their type problems and make-up.

ADDRESS INQUIRIES TO H. FRANK SMITH, EDITOR & PUBLISHER, WORLD BUILDING, NEW YORK

Replies Cannot Be Made by Mail

ONE of the most complicated "takes" the newspaper has to contend with is the double-page spread, and while the order for insertion pleases the business office, the great raft of copy (to come) and cuts (being made) worry the composing room, almost to distraction—sometimes.

Under the most favorable conditions the composition of an attractive double-page newspaper ad is not an easy task—requiring, as it does, a quick and accurate visualization of the advertiser's idea as expressed in the layout, and a quicker and more accurate reproduction of this idea into slugs, type, and decorative materials—all assembled into one reasonably harmonious unit.

Late copy and later cuts, aided and abetted by an inadequate layout and indefinite instructions, usually complicate the conditions and add to the difficulties under which the average "double-truck" is finally completed.

And when the job is really finished—and we give it the once-over in the printed paper—we are justified, perhaps, in taking pride in a big job well done.

Some Important Things to Consider In Planning "Double-Trucks."

OF course there must be a plan (layout and instructions)—and a dang good one, too, if our double-spread is going to be done quickly and effectively. The majority of double-page newspaper ads seem to indicate that the importance of the planned-in-advance layout is entirely overlooked and the material thrown together on the two pages in any old way in an effort to make the edition. This method is wrong, costly and unprofitable.

On the other hand, we frequently run across "double-pages" so carefully planned and composed that they might be called masterpieces of newspaper typography—which is proof that there must be certain principles of planning that may easily be followed, if we can organize these principles for quick reference. Let's try:

1—First and most important, the double-page must be planned on a layout sketched to the exact size of the two pages on which the advertisement is to be printed—instead of roughing up the idea in any old way on any size paper and putting it up to the composing room to get the stuff in type by hook or crook.

2—After the over-all size has been made exactly, (a) indicate the border desired; (b) sketch in the main head and company name and address; (c) position the big feature, whether it's an illustration, a special sale, the store editorial, or whatnot—but get these details placed.

3—At this stage we have a skeleton layout, planned to exact size. Now break up the remaining space into columns, or units of space, to accommodate the copy and cuts—keeping in mind the importance of orderly arrangement, and also still keeping the columns, or units of space, exact size.

4—After the width of columns, or units of space, have been indicated sketch in the important heads, paste in proofs of cuts, and indicate displayed prices—if any are used.

5—Plan to leave out meaningless boxes, rules, ornaments and dingbats. Don't smother the ad with useless typographic material that has nothing to do with what is offered for sale. Simplicity adds to the legibility by clarifying the whole composition.

6—Since the double-page has no competition for attention it is not necessary to worry about bold displays—that is, bold types and borders. Big display can be used—but light face materials employed. Don't use the stud-horse type and funeral borders—strive for emphasis and attention value through attractiveness and orderly arrangement.

There is More Than One Way to Lay Out a Striking Double-Page

IT is indeed remarkable, if not surprising, to note the many different ways in which the double-page ad, or "two pages facing," may be planned or laid out for the newspaper. A few years back two individual pages seemed to be the style; then some daring chap introduced the "double-truck"—utilizing the usual white space between individual pages and which is generally known as the "gutter" and welding the two individual pages in one whole unit.

Other treatments of the "double page" quickly followed, until now we have a range of choice to satisfy the most finicky advertiser—providing someone will get on the job and do a little contriving in the form of a planned-in-advance layout before the copy begins to reach the composing room.

Five "Double-Trucks" and Hunches Well Worth Considering

THE five specimens accompanying this article serve to illustrate some of the different ways in which a double-page "spread" may be treated from a layout and typographical standpoint—although these few specimens do not exhaust the possibilities by any means. Referring to the specimens, we find the following interesting things:

Specimen No. 1—This is an example of the double-page of yesterday—that is, the style is two individual pages hooked up by uniform display heads and rule-and-border-treatment. These two pages would have been more attractive had the same family of type faces been used—instead of so many different kinds. However, there is a pleasing quietness about the two pages—that makes the whole attractive and much better than the usual run of double-pages of this kind.

Specimen No. 2—A "double-truck" of today—where all the space on the two pages except that required for the lock-up has been used to advantage. Note (1) the streamer head running across the two pages; (2) the placing of the dominant feature; (3) the grouping of related articles in one unit; (4) the treatment and position of the different boxed items; and (5) the same type face and borders used throughout. Considering the time in which this material must be prepared, type set, prices checked, proofs o.k'd, etc.—this Namm advertisement from the New York Evening Journal is a splendid illustration of the effectiveness of the planned-in-advance layout—especially when the layout is based on the principles of orderly arrangement (as this one is).

Specimen No. 3—Here we have a "double-truck" where the outside columns are utilized for reading matter—one of the ways in which the "double-truck" treatment is frequently modified. This particular ad is well planned as far as breaking up into orderly units is con-

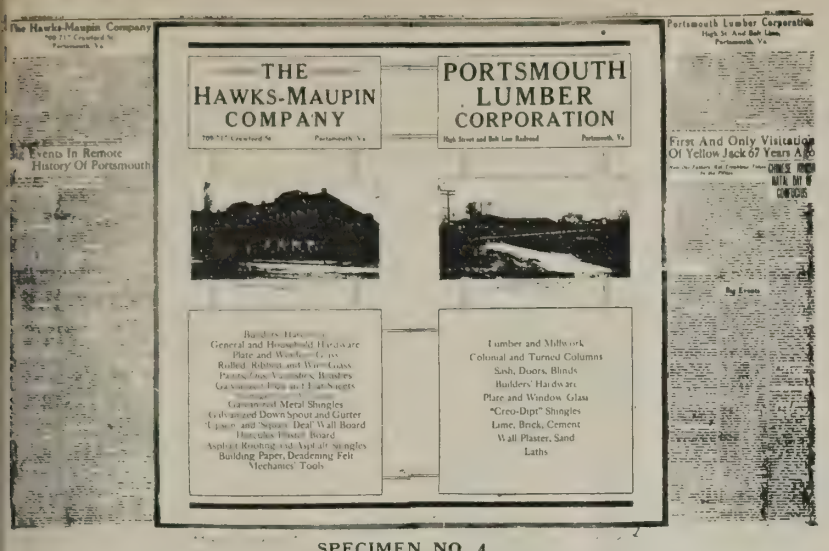
The "double-truck" of yesterday—where two individual pages are hooked up by uniform heads and uniform rule-and-border treatment.



SPECIMEN NO. 2

A "double-truck" of today—where all the space on the two pages (except that required for lock-up) is utilized to advantage.

SPECIMEN NO. 3

A layout in which the "double-truck" idea is modified to include text matter in the outside columns of each page.

SPECIMEN NO. 4

A "double-truck" effect in which two good ideas are incorporated—three columns of text in outside columns, and hooking up two advertisers in one unit of space.

SPECIMEN NO. 5

A splendid example of "double-truck" layout. Note great amount of material, and how simply and attractively it has been arranged.

cerned, but it seems to be screaming unnecessarily loud for attention—since it has no competition. That's another matter, however; merely note the treatment of two outside columns, which illustrates another way of handling the "double-truck."

Specimen No. 4—This example offers a couple of suggestions, and good ones: (1) a "double-truck" effect by utilizing three columns of text on outside of each page (a good hunch for a layout), and (2) getting two different advertisers to team up for a "double-truck" effect (a good selling idea). The pages probably would have been more effective—had more thought and care been taken with the typography.

Specimen No. 5—A notable example of effective double-page layout and typography. Encouraged by a splendid heading running across both pages, we can start at the beginning of this ad and read leisurely to the end—without having to handle a lot of panels and boxes, and getting all tangled up in a maze of other typographical rubbish. Note particularly what was left out of this ad, as well as what was put into it. The most general practice with a double-page ad is to enclose it in a wide, freakish border of some kind: then fill the inside with a lot of other different borders, some boxes and a few unrelated dingbats thrown in for good measure—which wastes valuable space, increases composition costs, eats up hours of extra time, crowds and smothers the ad so that it is hard to get interested in it and much harder to read it, and because of these handicaps, probably, greatly reducing its pulling power—and profitableness. This admirable double-page of the Chicago Tribune furnishes still another example of the excellent results of the planned-in-advance layout.

While the "double-truck" is usually a difficult problem, because of the great raft of material that must go into it and especially on account of the lateness with which the copy is generally sent to the composing room—nevertheless it offers the newspaper a real opportunity to show what it can do in an emergency.

The best way, and the easiest, to meet an emergency is to be prepared for it—and this means we must observe more closely and study more carefully the many possibilities of the "double-truck" in the matter of better typography, better arrangement, better illustrations and better layouts.

COUNTRY SHOPS SLOVENLY

Oregon Editor Suggests "Clean-Up" Week for Weekly Newspapers

William J. Hayner, proprietor of the Sutherlin (Ore.) Sun, suggests in Oregon Exchanges that printing offices observe "Clean-up Week."

"During the 40 years or more in which I have been engaged in the printing business in various states, it has been my privilege to visit many country shops, and on several occasions it has surprised me that some of these junk-shop printeries were able to function to the extent of producing a weekly newspaper or a sale bill," he said. "Invariably these offices had so many dead ads and jobs standing around in a pied condition, that the cases where this material should have been contained nothing but a few thin spaces, two or three fff's and a half dozen $ marks.

"There is absolutely no excuse for the dirty and slovenly condition in which we find the mechanical department of many country print shops, and the sooner proprietors of such places recognize this fact and inaugurate a 'clean-up' week, the better it will be for their business."

A Review of Newspapers With the Idea of Making Friendly and Helpful Suggestions to Improve Typography and Make-Up

By H. FRANK SMITH

Have You a Problem in Typography or Make-up?

PUBLISHERS may have the benefit of Mr. Smith's suggestions by merely sending to EDITOR & PUBLISHER a copy of their paper—or better still, write Mr. Smith direct about any problem of typography or make-up that might be bothering you. The suggestions will be made with reasonable promptness and frankly and in a spirit of helpfulness. What's on your mind now—typographically?

Ask Definite Questions, and Address Letter and Papers (in one package) to

H. FRANK SMITH, EDITOR & PUBLISHER, WORLD BUILDING, NEW YORK

NATIONAL BULLETIN, QUINCY, CAL.—While we have frequently commented on the Bulletin, we cannot let this opportunity go by without again complimenting George Secor, the owner and editor, upon the exceptional attractive typography and makeup of each succeeding issue of his splendid paper. Publishers desiring to get a few lessons in the art of effective newspaper typography and makeup should secure copies of the Bulletin. Mr. Secor proves that it can be done by showing in each issue ways and means of doing it.

NEWS, BATON ROUGE, LA.—Opening up subheads with two-point leads will improve your otherwise very attractive front pages. Replace solid-black border used on some of your ads with something more pleasing. Editorial page nicely handled. Isn't classified head too light? Try something a little heavier—think you will like it better; and it will put a little more life in the page.

HUGH H. LOPER, JOURNAL-CHRONICLE, OWATONNA, MINN.—You folks do not need any suggestions from me about newspaper typography. The Journal-Chronicle is equal in every way to the best that I have seen among the weekly papers. If you do not believe this, enter your paper in the next contest for best front pages, attractive makeup, or anything—you'll get some of the prize money! Owatonna is very fortunate, indeed, to be represented by such an attractive paper.

CARLETON B. CLYMA, MESSENGER, STUART, FLA.—If everything in Stuart is as attractive and pepful as the Messenger, it must be the kind of a live community where a fellow would like to live. The Messenger is only a 5-column paper, but it has more "go-getting" stuff in it (in the form of newsy news, newsy ads, and newsy features—all splendidly set up and made up) than most papers three or four times its size. If the rest of the community keeps up with the pace set by the Messenger, verily Stuart will grow by leaps and bounds!

STROYAN LEITH, PETERBORO, CAN.—Thank you for your recent cordial letter. On pages 208-210 EDITOR & PUBLISHER Year Book for 1924 you will find a complete list of the best books on printing, publishing and estimating, together with the authors and publishers. If you want books concerning printing only, write for catalogs to American Printer, 239 West 39th street, New York, or the Inland Printer, 632 Sherman street, Chicago.

E. A. GIANTVALLEY, NEWS, JACKSON HEIGHTS, N. Y.—The only suggestion I would make would be for you to pep up the heads a little by setting them in larger sizes of upper-and-lower case—at least the more important ones. There is a certain monotony about the typography that minimizes the attractiveness of the News, and since Jackson Heights is one of New York's most progressive communities I would try to reflect this spirit in the News by pepping up its dress. The publication carries enough interesting matter to make the effort well worth while. Go ahead—and let's see how it looks.

PAUL DODGE, NEWS, TUCUMCARI, N. M.—Except for the light-face italic heads, I should say that the News looks about as spiffy as one would want. Italic lightface is not a good type for so many heads and I would suggest that you change this face to a bold face italic, and use this style head a little more sparingly. Think heads on your editorials should be a size larger, or caps of the face you are now using. Ads look good, makeup and presswork fine—let's see some recent issues.

NEWS-RECORD, MIAMI, OKLA. — We always like to look over the News-Record because the news is presented with a makeup that has a wallop in it. I cannot imagine anyone getting hold of a copy of this paper without giving it a pretty careful reading. The folks in Miami must enjoy reading the News-Record.

STANDARD, WESTPORT, CONN.—While this paper has always been noted for the exceptional care with which it is published, a recent bank supplement is entitled to special notice because of the splendid way in which eight extra pages were handled typographically—and otherwise. It must be a source of considerable satisfaction to the staff that can turn out a paper as attractive as the Standard.

Cowboy Cover Adorns Paper Distributed at Oklahoma to N.E.A.

Copies of EDITOR & PUBLISHER distributed to members of the National Editorial Association in convention last week at Oklahoma City were stitched into a new brown cover. "Welcome to Oklahoma" read the legend above the design of a cowboy adhering to the arched back of a bronco, while below the picture appeared "Compliments of Jim Brown, EDITOR & PUBLISHER." "Back Home" was the caption for the back-cover design, a drawing of an apparently busy newspaper office. Thanks and appreciation of EDITOR & PUBLISHER for this courtesy are due and hereby expressed to the Oklahoma Publishing Company, publisher of the Daily Oklahoman and Times.

KANSAS NEWSPAPER FAMILY

Six Jarrells Engaged in Various Forms of Journalism

Jack Jarrell, a Topeka, Kan., high school student, has joined the editorial staff of the Topeka State Journal, making the Jarrells a 100 per cent newspaper family.

J. F. Jarrell, the father, is publicity director of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway and for many years was a newspaper editor and reporter. Mrs. Jarrell is a short story writer, has published one novel and formerly was a reporter on the Topeka State Journal and the Topeka Daily Capital. Jack's two brothers are newspaper men, Arch being on the Wichita Beacon and Sanford a political reporter on the New York Herald Tribune. His sister, Barbara, is assistant editor of Action Stories and Novelets, two magazines published in New York.

EXPENSES EAT 88 PER CENT OF INCOME OF 61 INLAND PAPERS

Mechanical Department Budget Takes Almost 40 Per Cent of Total Revenue, Six-Month Survey Indicates—Editorial Expense About 14 Per Cent

By ARTHUR ROBB

THE first authentic compilation of newspaper cost figures covering any considerable number of newspapers, divided according to size is presented below on this page, by courtesy of the Inland Daily Press Association's committee on cost-finding, which has just completed in two years the first phase of its analysis of newspaper operation costs.

While the figures presented—covering the last six months of 1923—are not all that could be desired, for the obvious reason that they were not determined by applying uniform rules to individual reports, but on the interpretation of a set of rules by each publisher, they represent a new step in newspaper education. And, it may be assumed that the divisions of expenditure and income on the report blank filled out by each of the 61 publishers meant approximately the same thing to most of them and that the percentage totals shown are close enough to truth for practical, if not scientific, comparison.

Progress toward a uniform system of accounting will no doubt be made by the committee, which will continue its work under the chairmanship of E. H. Harris, Richmond (Ind.) Palladium. He succeeds C. R. Butler, Mankato (Minn.) Free Press, who will remain a member of the committee he has headed for two years, and they will have associated with them A. L. Miller, Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer-News.

Taking as its base, 100 per cent., the total income of each paper from all sources, the committee divided this into sources of income and avenues of outgo, and classified the 61 papers according to circulation—19 less than 5,000; 20, between 5,000 and 10,000; 19 over 10,000, and three not classified.

Taking the income columns first, it appears that advertising produces about 70 per cent. of the newspaper revenue. The 19 papers of less than 5,000 circulation took from advertising 68.5 per cent of their total income; those between 5,000 and 10,000 circulation received an average of 74.2 per cent from advertising; those over 10,000 circulation averaged 73.1 per cent.

Circulation then supplies from 24.8 to 30 per cent of the income, the latter figure being the average for the less than 5,000 circulation dailies; the former figure being taken from the 5,000-10,000 classification. Those having greater than 10,000 circulation averaged an income from it of 25.8 per cent.

Miscellaneous sources of income cover a variety of items, it may be guessed, the majority, however, representing sale of waste paper and metal. The less than 5,000 circulation dailies averaged 1.5 per cent in this column; the 5,000-10,000 class, 1.4 per cent, and the larger papers 1.1 per cent.

Turning from income to outgo, and using the same 100 per cent (the total income) as a base, it develops that mechanical department expense is by far the largest item on the publisher's books, no matter what his size. This department, whose total includes paper and ink, averages 36.7 for the dailies of less than 5,000 circulation; 37 per cent in the 5,000-10,000 class, and 38.7 in the papers having more than 10,000 circulation.

Breaking up the total into its larger components it develops that mechanical payroll—composing room, pressroom, and in easily 45 of the 61 papers, stereotyping—accounts for 21.1 per cent in the less than 5,000 group; 19.3 per cent in the 5,000-10,000 class, and 16.9 per cent among the larger papers.

Departmental expense, which should include metal, repairs, upkeep of machinery and equipment, and possibly light and power, averages 5.2 per cent in Class A, 3.6 per cent in Class B, and 7.4 per cent in Class C.

In this item, in the mechanical and other departments, arises the question of what publishers include as "departmental expense." It is inconceivable that, with a uniform system of accounting and allotment of expense, there should be such diversity of expense as appears under "Mechanical Department Expense" among papers of each of the three classes. In Class A, the extremes under this head are seven-tenths of one per cent, and 28 per cent; in Class B, the spread is between 1 per cent and 9.5 per cent; in Class C, the top and bottom of the scale are 7 per cent and 1.6 per cent.

Paper and ink, however, are stable items, and the averages for the groups are: Class A, 10.4 per cent; Class B, 13.9 per cent; Class C, 18.4 per cent. The reasons for the upward curve in this proportion are obvious.

Second in rank as a consumer of income is General Administration. Here again rises the question of what items are included. Taxes, interest on current or funded obligations, depreciation, rent, light, power, legal services, discounts taken and accorded, dues to various organizations, contributions, salaries to the chief executives and to clerical help in general administration—all these and other items may help to swell the total, or some of them may have been apportioned among the various departments sharing in their creation.

Without definite data, it is futile to speculate on the composition of this total, but that opinions differed on what items are "General Expense" is evident from the widely varying proportions reported.

COBB PRAISES "TYRANNY" OF SYNDICATES

Noted Humorist Says It Is Benevolent, Aiding Newspapers, Subscribers and Writers—Discusses American Journalism—Would Like to Be Sunday Editor—Hands Bouquet to Don Marquis

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"NEWSPAPER syndicates aren't going to go.

"All the protest in the world will never kill them."

Irvin Shrewsbury Cobb, in smart gray suit, silk shirt, gay tie and spats, shifted an unlighted cigar from one side of his mouth to the other and snorted. You don't know what snort means until you have met Mr. Cobb. When he snorts one sees a British bulldog instead of an author and journalist. One hears an intermingling of the words "rotten" and "good."

That snort, in fact, figured rather prominently in conversation with the American humorist this week in the upstairs lounge of the Lambs Club, New York. Sometimes it was directed at those gloomy critics who insist the American press has seen far better days and is fast sinking into nothing but an indignant daily snort itself. Other times it was aimed at those altogether too saccharine optimists who smirk outrageously about the eternal sunshine of journalistic skies.

Yes, Cobb tried hard to be optimistic but wavered frequently on the verge of pessimism during this interview, in which he discussed the "benevolent tyranny" of syndicates, newspapers in general and a few in particular, the tribe of newspaper men, and finally indulged in a personal if, deciding what he would do were he to return to newspaper work tomorrow.

"Syndicates are bringing about a widespread standardization of newspapers," he agreed, but insisted, "that's the trend of the times. Why should newspapers be an exception?

"Wayne Wheeler in Washington is standardizing our morals—or, at least trying to. He is the real ruler of this country today, let me tell you.

"Thought, mode and habit are all becoming standardized in the United States. Why not the newspapers?" he repeated.

"Really," here Cobb became as serious and earnest as he looks, which must be difficult, "syndicates have proved the salvation of the small town newspapers of this country.

"The benevolent tyranny of the syndicates, indeed, has given these papers a new lease on life.

"With the increase in good roads, the enhancing of transportation facilities generally, aiding distribution of the large city dailies, the country press of America was doomed until the syndicates stepped in and offered to help their owners to build up as good a paper as their city neighbor.

"The plan of the syndicates of having a graduating scale of prices has kept the monster press from swallowing up the smaller.

"Talent? Why, syndicates offer greater opportunity for developing men and women of talent than the newspapers of the old days could ever expect to offer.

"They make it possible for writers or artists to win greater reward in reputation and money than ever before was possible.

"But, of course, there's another side to the shield."

Another snort was due from Cobb at this point, and was faithfully delivered. He went so far as to remove his cigar during a brief pause and to contemplate its cold tip ruminatively. I think he even took off his gray felt hat and then put it on again.

"Well," he resumed, "let's say the syndicates are nine-tenths good and one-tenth bad, for newspapers, the subscribers, and the writers."

So that has been dutifully said.

"Good old days?" Cobb echoed the question which had been flung out in an effort to stir up the glad tales of a veteran looking backwards over journalistic history.

Says IRVIN COBB:

"The benevolent tyranny of syndicates has given the country press of America a new lease on life."

"Thought, mode, and habit are all becoming standardized in the United States today. Why not the newspapers?"

"Today we are in the Day of the Proprietor, and the predominating influence in the newspaper world is the man who owns a newspaper."

"Every day in newspaper work will always bring with it the spice of new adventure."

"Humor is both over-done and under-done in American newspapers. Some of the best humor is being written by the columnists."

"Considering what a newspaper man gives in intelligence, experience, training, judgment and native ability, all of them from the highest executive to the lowliest reporter are poorly paid—scandalously paid."

As everyone knows, Irvin Cobb has spent a good share of his 48 years as plain newspaper man before wrapping himself up in the chrysalis of journalist to emerge with an author's butterfly wings, including besides a walking stick, lunch at the Lambs Club, dinner at the Lotos Club, and an estate at Ossining, N. Y., called "Rebel Ridge."

At 16 he was a reporter, and at 19 was editor of the Paducah (Ky.) News, at that time the youngest, and Cobb claims, the worst editor in the country.

He has "written his way out" of the newspaper profession through the syndicates and magazines and is fast approaching a secure place in American literature, edging in between Mark Twain and Booth Tarkington.

"Good old days?" Cobb snorted again, as though to say that's an old wife's tale.

"All old men look back on a scintilating youth. In retrospect we always forget the bumps," he observed.

"As I see it, there has been three distinct periods in the history of American journalism. First came the Day of the Editor, when personal journalism was in full sway and editorial opinions of the big editors were eagerly awaited daily.

"Then came the Day of the Reporter, when real news stories were written, and well written. I think I belonged to this period, and I am glad of it.

"Today we are in the Day of the Proprietor, and the predominating influence in the newspaper world is the man who owns a newspaper. News stories and editorials have lost some of their power. Today it is the newspaper owner who is well known like Hearst, Ochs, Patterson and McCormick, the Pulitzers, Munsey and Scripps.

"We are losing something by this change, but romance will never disappear. Every day in newspaper work will always bring with it the spice of new adventure.

"Just think, no matter how much energy is put into a day's newspaper work, what has been created is all dead the same night. A new world must be built up with each day. We must recreate from the ground up to bring out the same finished product."

All this eulogy of newspapering led Cobb up to his "if."

"If I should go back to newspaper work tomorrow," he declared, "I would become a Sunday editor." That sounded anti-climactical.

"Oh, I've got all sorts of ideas for the Sunday editor's job," he resumed with enthusiasm.

"I'd try to get entirely away from the views of the moment. Isn't it true that most Sunday newspaper magazine sections are largely re-edited from the news of the week?

"Well, I'd divorce it entirely from the news and find entirely new features which wouldn't in the least savor of news. I'd try to hit the golden mean between the ultra-sensational and the sober Sunday pages."

But just about at this stage, Cobb's enthusiastic If began to dwindle—to lose its capital "I."

"The pay of a newspaper man is rotten," he observed. "The changes of time have increased wages somewhat, but certainly not proportionately.

"Considering what a newspaper man gives in intelligence, experience, training, judgment, and native ability, all of them from the highest executive to the lowliest reporter are poorly paid, scandalously paid.

"Just take a bank president in a small city. He receives two or three times as much as the managing editor of the local newspaper, while the average managing editor has far greater responsibilities than the bank president."

A sort of gloom had settled about the American humorist. A gloom that must be pierced. So naturally the subject turned towards humor.

Cobb on this subject was also ready with his wavering snort.

"Humor is overdone and underdone in American newspapers," he remarked.

"It wasn't long ago that I noticed in a New York newspaper a ghastly murder story, which a reporter had tried to make humorous.

"I think the best newspaper in the United States is the Chicago Tribune. It would be the New York Times if only Mr. Ochs had a sense of humor.

"Some of the best humor in American newspapers," he concluded, "is being written in the personal columns, notably the one conducted by Don Marquis on the New York Tribune. A lot of fellows are writing brilliant stuff in columns all over the country. It is a mighty good thing, too.

"But Marquis, I think, is one of the greatest natural humorists America ever has produced. Curiously enough, the three best columners today all appear in the Tribune—Marquis' on the editorial page and Grantland Rice's and Bill McGeehan's in the sporting pages."

NEWS MEN PLAN "JINX" GOLF TOURNAMENT

Visiting Writers at Cleveland G. O. P. Meet to Test Skill on Local Links Friday, June 13—Cups for Prizes

News writers going to Cleveland to cover the Republican national convention are urged to take along their golf paraphernalia so they can compete in a jinx tournament arranged by newspaper men of that city for Friday, the thirteenth of June.

The tournament will be on a blind handicap basis, and the biggest dub in the fraternity can hope to win a prize. Each player will chose his handicap based upon the score of one of the players—probably Ring Lardner—who will be pace maker.

If the player thinks he can play better than the pace maker he will take a minus handicap, otherwise he will add as many strokes to his score as he believes the pace maker will play the course better than his score.

The successful contestants will be the best guessers, but guessing is a feature of journalism in which political writers naturally feel at home.

The tournament will be played on the Oakwood course which measures 6,289 yards and has a par of 70 strokes. Walter Hagen won the Western Open championship on it in 1921 by defeating Jock Hutchinson and Jimmy Barnes. Hagen's score was 287. The course, while not extremely difficult, is deceiving and it affords a good test of golf. It is not far from the city.

For the convenience of those who may wish to leave the city on early evening trains, the tournament will start at 9:30 a. m. and will be played in foursomes at regular intervals. Lunch will be served all contestants, and prizes will be awarded after a buffet supper in the club house in the evening.

The prizes are:

To the low medalist, a sterling silver cup.

To the handicap winner, a sterling silver cup.

To the runner up, a sterling silver cup.

For the longest drive from the first tee, a bronze trophy.

For the low ringer score on holes 5, 7, 9, 13, 16 and 17.

"Ball a Birdie" on any player breaking par on any hole.

A. N. A. ASKS NEWSPAPERS TO ABOLISH SPECIAL EDITIONS

Hit Catalog and Program Advertising at Three-Day Cleveland Convention—170 Members Attend—20 Will Go to London Meet

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

CLEVELAND, May 28.—Primarily, the Association of National Advertisers at their 3 day semi-annual convention which closed today considered reduction of the cost of distribution, methods of advertising and selling, and the use of helpful methods. One hundred and seventy of the 300 members attended. About 20 members will represent the association at the London convention of the A. A. C. W. and they will meet with the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers, a body similar to the American organization. President P. L. Thompson, who presided at all general sessions, and Secretary John Sullivan will go to London.

R. N. Fellows, of the Addressograph Company, was appointed to the directorate to succeed Stanley Twist, of the same company, resigned.

W. S. Ashby was appointed to represent the Association on the National Commission of the A. A. C. W., succeeding the late George B. Sharpe.

Resolutions as follows were adopted before adjourning.

Favoring private ownership and operation of railways and other transportation facilities;

Co-operation of the public and government in encouraging railways to earn fair returns on their investment;

Opposition to "political agitation against railroads revealed in recent bills in Congress" and favoring fair-mindedness towards transportation problems.

Opposing advertising in special editions, catalogs, programs, etc., declaring the money thus expended by association members "and economic waste and an unjustifiable charge against the cost of distribution.

Condemning the policy of newspaper publishers of soliciting retailers, wholesalers and others for advertising for special editions, the methods declared to be "unethical, unsound and a menace to legitimate advertising."

The American Newspaper Publishers Association was asked by resolution to "co-operate with the A. N. A. in combatting these practices" and the officers and executive board of the A.N.P.A. asked to urge members to cease from these practices "in the interest of legitimate use of newspaper advertising and to avoid needless controversy between manufacturers and their distributive outlets."

Sessions of the advertising men were practically all executive, but during the Tuesday evening annual banquet at the Hotel Statler an address by Dr. Charles A. Eaton, of the National Lamp Works, was broadcast by station WJAX, of the Union Trust Company. Dr. Eaton praised the class of advertising the association members represent, saying "it helps sell America to Americans." He pointed out that good advertising is like honest merchandising—pays in the long run, because the clean advertiser invites public confidence and holds the esteem of his clients or customers, no matter whether he is advertising clothing or food, automobiles, or machinery.

During the first day's sessions Joseph P. Harris, vice-president of the Cleveland Trust Company, talking on "A Banker's View of Business Today," declared that "fundamentally business conditions are sound and that with these conditions there can be no serious depression."

He said during the past 30 days there "have been 3 developments of outstanding significance in the business world."

The first is the universal approbation of the Dawes and McKenna reports on international finance and the willingness of France, England, Belgium, Italy and Germany to accept the plans.

Second, the unmistakable evidence that industry, trade and transportation are slowing down.

Third, the lowering of discount rates by the New York Federal Reserve Bank.

With Congress adjourned, he said, confidence will come.

G. H. Abercrombie, secretary and sales manager of the Fuller Brush Company, Hartford, Conn., said the key to successful salesmanship is not criticism, but encouragement.

"A man will work for money only so long," he said. "After that you must give him responsibility to keep him satisfied. We try to instill this doctrine in all of our 6,500 employees throughout the nation."

E. D. Reed, of the F. F. Dalley Company, Buffalo, formulated a plan for a co-operative advertising movement like the "pride in appearance" once started in Cleveland last fall by retailers of men's clothing and furnishings and backed by the National Retail Clothiers' and Furnishers' Association. The plan was discussed Monday at a group session devoted to "personal appearance." The purpose of Reed's plan is to interest men in improving their appearance by having more changes of wearing apparel.

Paul B. Zimmerman, of the National Lamp Works, Cleveland, outlined ways of getting dealers to follow selling plans and hooking up with national advertising campaigns.

The services of advertising as taught in the University of Wisconsin were discussed by Prof. Edward H. Gardner of that institution.

During the Tuesday sessions Edward Edwin T. Hall, of the Ralston Purina Company, St. Louis, gave a practical demonstration of the Purina chow advertising with the aid of a miniature country town, and dressed himself up in the costume of "Purina Charley."

"Our famous checkerboard advertising," he said, "is designed to catch the eye and hold it. We base our methods on experiments which have proved that one appeal to the eye is worth 22 to the ear.

"Convincing local dealers that their advertising must supplement ours is one of the most important tasks of the national advertiser."

G. F. Lord, of the Chevrolet Motor Company, Detroit, discussing the sale of automobiles, said that "everybody is a prospect, regardless of the number of cars he or she may own or the price paid for them.

"We used to wait for the customer to come to us," he said. "Now we go after him with advertising of all kinds—daily newspapers, national magazine, billboards and other ways, and we are getting customers by the thousands."

M. E. Yadon, of the Bradley Knitting Mills Company, Delavan, Wis., said, "Direct mail advertising is important—that to get this advertising to the public, the manufacturer should sell, not give. to the dealer."

John Howie Wright, editor of The Postage, deplored the fact that most direct mail advertising is "dumped into the waste bascket because this matter does not jump right into the subject."

"Anything that can be sold can be sold by the printed word," he continued. "Effective advertising depends upon what you say, how you say it, who you say it to and how often you say it."

W. E. Yadon then told how he sold bathing suits where people had never learned to swim because there were natural swimming pools. He did it by an educational advertising campaign.

A special committee report Tuesday recommended the modified use of outdoor plans. Mrs. W. L. Lawton, Glenn Falls, N. Y., chairman of the National Committee on the restriction of outdoor advertising, supported a move to restrict bill boards. She said the aim of her committee is "to conserve scenic and civic beauty and not to abolish outdoor advertising entirely."

P. L. Thompson, association president, Tuesday evening pleaded for "a better understanding of public utilities." He is publicity manager for the Western Electric Company. His talk was broadcast.

Wednesday morning Martin L. Pierce of the Hoover Company, on "Better Sales Methods—Where the merchant is ultimate consumer," aroused considerable discussion.

Harry MacDonald, president of the Painted Bulletin Association, discussed "How we are meeting the demand for betterment of our medium"—by more artistic methods that appeal to the eye.

A joint luncheon and session of the visitors with the Cleveland Advertising Club at the Statler was held at noon.

After luncheon Samuel A. Weisenberger, advertising manager for the Halle Brothers Company's department store, Cleveland, said that "If your business gets a black eye, it's the advertising manager's fault."

MOORE DIRECTS LIGHT FOR W. R. HEARST

Publisher of Fort Worth Record Takes Charge of San Antonio Daily—Reveals Details of Sale—Price "Nearly a Million"

Details of the sale of the San Antonio Light by H. L. Beach and C. S. Diehl to William Randolph Hearst, were made public May 22, in San Antonio by D. D. Moore, publisher of the Fort Worth (Tex.) Record who represented Mr. Hearst.

D. D. Moore

Moore informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER the price paid was "nearly one million dollars." Except for the retirement of Beach and Diehl no immediate changes are contemplated in the business or editorial departments, Moore said.

Mr. Moore will, in addition to his duties as publisher of the Record only other Hearst paper in Texas, also direct the Light for the present, spending part of his time in San Antonio.

Sale of the Light to Hearst was made May 12, Moore revealed. Change to the Hearst make-up was effected this week. Under the new ownership, the Light, which already has the Associated Press service will take the Hearst wire services and such Hearst features as are desired as fast as they are released from others having them under contract, Moore declared.

Mr. Moore stated that the Light will continue only afternoon and Sunday morning editions as at present. Reorganization of the publishing company, including election of directors is scheduled for next week. The Light's Associated Press membership now is in the name of Col. Diehl. Regarding the foreign advertising situation, Mr. Moore said it was the Hearst policy to carry out all contracts.

Col. Diehl said on May 22 he had no immediate plans but said he would continue to reside in San Antonio. Beach is understood to contemplate a European tour. Diehl and Beach have had the Light more than 13 years.

"We are retiring because we received a good price and as everybody must retire some time we thought this a good time for us," said Col. Diehl. It was reported, but not confirmed, that the Light purchase price included $600,000 cash.

Mr. Moore would only say that the total, including that assumed, was "not quite" a million.

C. P. Taft, of Cincinnati, was among those associated in the Light ownership with Beach and Diehl.

REPORT HEARST BUYING MILWAUKEE SENTINEL

Hearst Executives Await Definite Information Before Denying or Confirming Revived Rumor of Sale

Reports were current in New York and Milwaukee this week that William R. Hearst had purchased the Milwaukee Sentinel, a morning, evening and Sunday newspaper. EDITOR & PUBLISHER is advised by its Milwaukee correspondent that the presence in that city this week of M. Annenberg, circulation chief of the Hearst newspapers, had given force to the revived report of the Sentinel's sale to Mr. Hearst. Mr. Annenberg declined to comment.

A Hearst official in New York told EDITOR & PUBLISHER that he had no definite information on the reported transaction.

Another variation of the gossip that Mr. Hearst had assumed the operation but not the ownership of the Sentinel was not confirmed.

The Sentinel is owned and published by C. F. Pfister, and edited by George Lounsbury.

Mr. Pfister replied to a request for a statement that could make no comment at the present time.

If the Sentinel passes to Mr. Hearst's ownership, and if, as seems logical, he merges its evening edition with his Wisconsin News and its Sunday edition with his Sunday Milwaukee Telegram, he will have 13-issues-a-week operations in the following cities:

BOSTON—Morning Advertiser (tabloid); Evening American; Sunday Advertiser (regular format).

NEW YORK—American (morning and Sunday); Evening Journal.

BALTIMORE—American (morning and Sunday); News (evening).

WASHINGTON—Herald (morning and Sunday); Times (evening.)

CHICAGO—Herald & Examiner (morning and Sunday); American (evening)

MILWAUKEE — Sentinel (morning) Wisconsin News (evening); Sunday Milwaukee Telegram.

SAN FRANCISCO—Examiner (morning and Sunday); Call-Post (evening).

LOS ANGELES—Examiner (morning and Sunday); Herald (evening).

In addition to these, Mr. Hearst also owns these evening and Sunday papers—Detroit Times, Syracuse Telegram and American, Rochester Journal & Post Express and Sunday American, Atlanta Georgian and Hearst's Sunday American, San Antonio Light.

Cities in which he publishes only morning and Sunday papers are Seattle with the Post-Intelligencer, and Fort Worth, with the Record.

No Sunday papers accompany the Hearst enterprises in Albany, where he owns the Times-Union; nor in Oakland where his property is the Post-Enquirer.

Claims Church Advertising Record

May 27, 1924.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: In your edition of May 23, you carried a paragraph in which the Baltimore News claims a record for church advertising.

The Brooklyn Eagle, ever since the first of the year, has consistently carried 16 to 18 columns of church advertising every Saturday. For Easter the Eagle carried four and one-half pages of church advertising, and since then we have carried about a page and a half. I think this is a greater record than that of the Baltimore News.

During the year 1923 the Eagle carried 217,816 lines of church advertising. These are the figures as computed by the New York Evening Post Statistical Bureau.

WOULD MAKE U. S. "BEST DRESSED NATION"

Reed Promoting National "Dress Up" Campaign Stressing Importance of Personal Adornment and Correct Attire—Would Enlist Newspapers, Schools, Women's Clubs, and Ad Associations

By E. D. REED

Advertising Manager, F. F. Dalley Company, Inc.

DURING the past two years considerable attention has been given to the personal appearance appeal in the advertising of a few national advertisers. The effort, however, has not been cumulative in effect, owing to the small amount of prominence given the idea by the individual companies concerned. However, the thought of the excellent results that could be obtained through the general adoption of this "pride in appearance" idea if properly worked out, has resulted in a number of conferences called by the F. F. Dalley Corporation and members of the Association of National Advertisers, Inc. In order to make a definite start it was decided to incorporate an association for the promotion in a large way of the "pride in appearance" idea.

E. D. Reed

The objects of the association will be wide and embrace the "dress up" idea from every possible angle. Every one admits the economic value of such an association when it is considered that manufacturers and retailers of every conceivable product used either for personal wear or adornment, are interested in increased sales—a larger turnover.

For instance, the clothing industry will be interested in the promotion of the "pride in appearance" idea—proper dress, a frequent change, an additional suit, etc. The same will appeal to manufacturers of hats, shoes, shirts, collars, neckties, hosiery, etc.

We believe the shoe manufacturers are already trying to instill the idea of "No tan shoes after 6 P. M." They are playing a lone hand but this idea gains from the cumulative force of a combined attack by all personal wear and adornment factors.

There are many reasons for the promotion of this "pride in appearance" idea at this time. People have become careless of their appearance through the use of the motor car, which is directly the opposite result that should be expected. It is a condition favorable to a change. The new thought (and an admirable one) of getting a little fresh air and exercise by walking a block or two before hopping the car, train, bus or subway in the morning and the same in the evening, means that these people will respond to the "personal appearance" idea and these walkers will represent an excellent subject for an example of the necessity of pride in appearance.

Many newspapers and magazine articles have appeared on the subject of personal appearance from time to time. In 1916 the Saturday Evening Post published the story entitled "Skinner's Dress Suit," while just last month Dr. Orisen Swett Marden had an article in Success Magazine. on the "Psychology of Clothes" but clothes are only one item, although a very important one, in the "personal appearance" category. The teeth, hair, complexion, hands, eyes, all features in general are included, and tooth paste, tooth brushes, shaving cream, shaving apparatus, face cream, lotions, soap, hair brushes, hat brushes, clothes and clothes brushes, barber, neckties, underwear, corsets, hosiery, hose supporters, shoes, shoe polish, shoe strings, all pertain to the personal comfort and appearance of the people.

The same publications that have printed columns on personal appearance lines have also decried the fact that we are a poorly dressed nation. It should be the reverse, the United States should be the world's best dressed nation. It will be our object to make the United States the best dressed nation of the world.

The papers are full of suggestions for styles and fashions, but the individuality of these appeals have lacked the force that a real Pride in Appearance Campaign would have run in accordance with modern merchandising ideas.

Our schools and colleges are all more or less interested in this problem of instilling personal pride in their scholars and students. That the importance of personal appearance must be instilled into the mind of those whom our colleges and universities are turning out as leaders of men, has long been acknowledged. West Point Academy is one example.

Success is, in a great degree influenced by appearance, possibly more than anything other than ability.

Appearances often make or break a business.

If we can get the great American public to realize the harm it is doing itself through lack of this very important item and get the public awakened and alive to their personal appearance, we need not worry about the prosperity of the business of any individual or company manufacturing things that are used for personal adornment and which assist in the improvement of personal appearance.

The reaction will be all-embracing, as wide in scope as it is economically sound. How many people today through lack of interest in the subject generally, or indifferent to appearances, let their shoes run down at the heel, wear threadbare suits, shapeless hats or scuffed gloves? We all know their number is legion. Admitting this then, is it not also a fact that most people when made conscious of their remissions will correct them. It is a delicate subject when attempted personally, an easy one when tackled broadly.

To promote this movement, publicity is of primary importance. By the use of magazines, newspapers, billboards, street cars, etc., we can make the public realize its negligence in dress and personal appearance by stressing the benefits and pleasure to be derived from keeping one's appearance or the "pride in appearance" thought, creating a jealousy of it that does not even exist today.

The extent to which this appeal may be elaborated upon is without any bounds, the field for the imagination is large and varied in this to any extent we wish to go. It is already an item of intense human interest, the inherent desire has but to be aroused. There is no limit to the copy appeal and the material for it is inexhaustible.

There is every reason in the world why every man, woman, boy and girl should for their own advancement, social or commercial, realize the importance of their personal appearance.

It will be very easy to point out to them that there exists no more pleasant or easy avenue to gain these ends.

In all our advertising, magazine, newspapers, billboard, street cars, etc., we will put across the message of our slogan, which has not yet been chosen. Around this slogan all our advertising will be built. By continued repetition and by prominent display we will soon make this slogan a "by-word" with the American public. We can teach them how to dress, point out the right way; the wrong way. We can, by continually bringing it to their attention have them notice the neatness and confidence of their well dressed neighbors and passers-by. We can by the very natural interest in their fellow men create a new standard of judgment.

It recalls the old adage "Fine Feathers Make Fine Birds." It is true. We can give our magazine and newspaper advertisements a real human interest and economic appeal.

There is also the endorsement of our leading educationalists and employers. Many of us are familiar with the fact that the Pullman Company require every colored porter to have his hands manicured and his shoes polished every day before every trip and his linen coat must be kept spotlessly white and clean. Our public school teachers will all be glad to co-operate in promoting such a fundamentally sound principle as pride in personal appearance.

Through newspapers, schools, colleges and universities, through local clubs and organizations, women's clubs, etc., we can promote the idea of "personal dress up" and "pride in appearance."

We can have America dressing for functions, we can have the cellar equipped with a duster for the furnace work, the garage equipped for tinkering at the car, the man will slip on his smoking jacket at home and his office coat will be religiously donned and removed. For driving, riding, walking, golfing, shooting, boating, hunting, party, banquet or business, we will instill a desire for wearing those things which have singled out certain nations and people who take pride in dress, and make the doing of these things a desire, accomplishing our ends with twofold results in business created.

We are all more or less familiar with the success of the Orange Growers "Sunkist" and the cranberry, "Eatmor Cranberries," and "Sunmaid" raisins, "Have you had your iron today?" and the florist's "Say it with Flowers," the "Save the Surface and Save All," prune growers, walnut growers, Portland Cement Association, and so on. There are many others.

The story of their success is indeed interesting.

Take for instance the Paint Manufacturers Association, they started their "Save the Surface and Save All" campaign with the idea of doubling the paint business in 5 years. Through their very efficient collective effort they report that in just two and one half years they have reached their objective. Their assessment of members was 1-8 of 1 per cent of each manufacturer's sales.

Surely the human appeal of pride in personal appearance has a far greater potential value in business, considering its many varieties, than the appeal of paint, which is limited. It is doubtful if any manufacturer would admit that his product for personal wear or adornment is secondary to paint. Collectively, then, an appeal affecting the products of all kinds for personal adornment or wear, should succeed just in proportion to their greater importance in the affairs of the people.

FRANCE PAYS A NEW HIGH HONOR TO GIBBONS

Director of Paris Edition of the Chicago Tribune Decorated

FLOYD GIBBONS, famous in the history of the World War, has just received new honors. In recognition of his recent trip across the Sahara Desert, Marshal Foch, in Paris, pinned on his lapel the Cross of the Legion d'Honneur, the scene being depicted in the accompanying photograph.

Present at the ceremony were Mr. and Mrs. Edward J. Gibbons, the parents of the famous newspaperman.

Gibbons also possesses a decoration from the French Government for bravery above and beyond the call of duty. He saved the life of a wounded officer by carrying him through shell fire to safety. The photograph shows him still wearing a mask for his left eye which was torn out by machine gun fire as he lay in a bullet-swept wheat-field, in advance of the front lines of the U. S. Marine Corps in company with several officers.

Floyd Gibbons is at present director of the Paris Edition of the Chicago Tribune, and also plays an important part in the Chicago Tribune news service in Europe.

He recently spoke before the American Club in Paris, relating the adventures encountered upon his trip across the Sahara Desert to Timbuctoo. He is now making plans for covering Capt. Amundsen's forthcoming flight across the North Pole in an aeroplane. Gibbons will accompany the explorer on the flight.

N. E. A. WAIVES RULE TO ELECT BRONSON PRESIDENT AS MARK OF GRATITUDE

Vice-President Marble Steps Aside for Oklahoman, Who Arranged Present Tour, But Will Conduct Association During His Illness

By WALLACE ODELL

(Retiring President, National Editorial Association.)

EL RENO, Okla., May 25.—The National Editorial Association paid splendid tribute today to Edward S. Bronson, editor of the El Reno American, when it elected him president. Mr. Bronson is critically ill and the association wanted to recognize his work for the organziation and what he did to make this wonderful trip possible. His election was without precedent and was made possible through the unselfish and sacrificing spirit of George W. Marble, Fort Scott (Kan.) Tribune-Monitor, who are re-elected vice- president and acting president. Mr. Marble will carry on all work of the association, whose members expressed deep appreciation of his act.

OKLAHOMA CITY, May 28.—Members of the National Editorial Association, Mexico-bound, aboard their special train, rolled out of Oklahoma at the close of a $500,000 artillery demonstration staged by the War Department on the Fort Sill military reservation. As if to complete the desired effect of reproducing a bit of the terrain along the Western front of six years ago, a drizzling rain fell all the night before and resumed as the N. E. A. folk set forth from their hotel for the "battle-field."

Accompanied by Gov. M. E. Trapp and his staff, numerous army officers, guides, and several thousand Oklahomans attracted by the promise of the greatest explosion of Uncle Sam's ammunition since the war ended, the editors fared to a mountainside. Artillery mobilized from other Southwestern posts, machine guns, infantry and aircraft detachments from the Fort Sill forces, took part in the problem, which was the conquest of trenches on a hillside across the valley from the editors' vantage-point.

The editors concluded their Oklahoma City session with a dramatic abandonment of the rule of succession which has come to prevail in the election of their president, as told above. Acting President Marble, with President Bronson's approval, has named the following vice-presidents by States—

SONGS OF THE CRAFT

By Henry Edward Warner

FUGITIVES

Floating somewhere in the nebulous air,
Or hitched to a shimmering Star,
Or wherever there gleams the aurora of dreams
Such as dreams of the Hopefulest are,
There are fugitive thoughts of a book or a play,
Or a plot that reached never an end,
And ever and ever they drift on their way
With the fortunes we never shall spend.

Drifting away in the blue and the gray
Of a sky that is studded with light,
There are thoughts that were born on the blush of a morn
And that never survived to the Night!
There are men anchored fast to The Job who would soar
On the wings of their dreams that have fled,
Who are only held back by the Copy Desk's roar.
For a yarn worth a Number One head!

Oh, life is to laugh! . . . and the Pride of the Staff
Sits wishing with meaningful eyes,
For he's just sent his Best to the critical test
Of the morons where Hollywood lies!
And the Column Man frowns as he opens his mail
That is stamped with the stamps he enclosed!
And why should the Poet turn sickened and pale
At the Fate of a Thing he composed?

Yet we shall not fret, while we try to forget
All the fugitive thoughts of our dreams,
Where we've tackled and flunked, all the stuff has been junked
And is lost in the glare of the gleams
That light up the way for such fugitive things,
As the fragments that flicker and flare
Do one little turn, till their memory clings
To their patch in the nebulous air.

ADVERTISING BUILT AMERICA'S WEALTH DANA TELLS COAST AD CLUBS

800 Delegates Attend Fresno Convention—Coolidge Sends Greetings—Newspapers Lauded as Media—Spencer of Seattle Conceded Presidency

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

FRESNO, Cal., May 28.—"Co-operative Advertising—How the Pacific Coast is Selling Itself to the World," was the underlying theme of the twenty-first annual convention of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association which opened in this city Sunday, May 25.

Numbered among the 800 delegates in attendance at the four-day sessions were some of the best known figures in the advertising and merchantile fields of the Pacific Ciast. Authorities who came to tell their secrets of success and to learn what the other fellow is doing to build and maintain the prosperity of the 3 states, California, Oregon and Washington, and Territory of Hawaii included in the Association's jurisdiction.

Opening the session was the address of Marshall Dana, associate editor of the Portland (Ore.) Journal, at a great open air meeting in Roeding Park.

Immediately preceding Mr. Dana's address was a speech by Lou E. Holland, president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, who said that in a recent conversation with President Coolidge, the President had expressed the hope that "Truth In Advertising" would bring about a better understanding between all nations, for then there would be no more wars.

Both Dana and Holland were introduced by Don Francisco, co-manager of Lord and Thomas, Los Angeles, president of the P. C. A. C. A.

Declaring that the United States still would be near the log cabin days of progress without advertising, Mr. Dana pointed out how the United States could never have accumulated, without advertising, a wealth of 300 billions in the nation's short life when all the world's wealth at the beginning of American independence was not more than 1,000 billion dollars.

"We could never have owned half of the world's railways, three-quarters of the tlephones, nine-tenths of the automobiles, and all but 2 per cent of the world's raidio. We never could have spread in a century 3,000 miles over a raw territory and make the last stand the best. We could not today be converting as much of Nature's resources into uses good for humanity as the rest of the world combined, nor could we find the uses and the consumers without advertising. Advertising is to business as electric current is to the dynamo.

"Advertising is the chief of staff in making America the greatest nation in the world. It has elevated our standards of living by keeping before us the incentive to possess the better things of life.

"It has put cleanliness and sanitation in the kitchen. It has made the old fashioned, little used, 'front room' over into a real living room by finishing it with the best of nationally advertised products.

"It furnishes us the modern facilities of the bath, the shave and the clothing we put on. It is our most intelligent adviser as to the things we eat and the beverage wherewith we warm or refresh ourselves.

"Advertising is the first ally of public health. It is the exponent of courage and the antithesis of fear.

"Business takes heart when it begins to advertise. Advertising will make business men community leaders in good times, but more so in worse times.

"It is the voice of Business, the voice of Nature and the voice of the fields, of the orchards, and the forests.

"It is the voice of appeal to come out of the crowded places and revel in the beautiful, the wholesome and the good. It is the agency whereby the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs may justify their Pacific Coast character.

"Let the west advertise all the west."

The general sessions opened Monday and were conducted through Tuesday and Wednesday, May 26, 27 and 28.

Under the direction of Don Francisco, C. M. C. Raymond, executive secretary Advertising Club of Los Angeles, secretary; W. C. Beaumont, president of the Fresno Advertising Club, and Harry B. Gregory, general manager of the Fresno Republican, chairman of the general convention committee, the convention program was fulfilled without a hitch.

Lloyd Spencer, past president of the Seattle Advertising Club, was nominated for the office of president to succeed Francisco.

There were no other candidates for the position and his election was conceded.

Seattle was chosen as the 1925 convention place without competition.

The complete list of officers nominated follows: President Lloyd Spencer, Seattle, past president of the Seattle Club; Raymond P. Kelly, Spokane, for re-election as president for Eastern Washington; Guy Llewellyn, Tacoma, director of the Tacoma Club, for vice-president in Western Washington; Marshall Dana, Portland, past president of the Portland Club, for vice-president in Oregon; W. C. Beaumont, Fresno, president of the Fresno Club, for vice-president in Northern California and Hawaii; A. Carman Smith, Los Angeles, president of the Los Angeles Club, for vice-president of Southern California; Florence Gardner, secretary of the San Francisco, Club for vice-president of women's participation.

A. Loomis of Portland was appointed to fill the unexpired term until the election, Wednesday, of W. S. Kirkpatrick of Portland, vice-president for Oregon.

The new Petaluma Club and the new Advertising Club of Honolulu applied for membership. Petaluma was admitted, and the Honolulu application was approved subject to ratification by the A. A. C. W.

President Don Francisco presided at the dinner meeting Monday evening. He reported on his stewardship of association affairs during the year.

His reports showed that the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association, which is affiliated with the A. A. C. W. as District No. 12, now comprises 19 clubs in Pacific Coast cities with a total membership of 3467.

A personal message from President Coolidge was read as follows:

"Please express to the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association my greetings and good wishes. Advertising is the given word of the producers to the consumer. As advertising men, it is your duty to see that that word is not broken and to keep faith with the public, which relies upon you for guidance in the daily affairs of life."

A feature of the convention was offered by the Fresno Bee. This was a series of news stories from the home towns of the convention delegates published under 2 column reproductions of the mastheads of the newspapers in the various cities included in the jurisdiction of the P. C. A. C. A.

Expressing Gov. F. W. Richardson's regrets at not being able to attend the sessions, David C. Williams, state assemblyman from the 49th district, extended the governor's greetings to the delegates.

Paul Shoup, vice-president of the Southern Pacific, president of the Associated Oil Company, and president of the Pacific Electric Railway, declared that advertising was the stimulus that made California increase its population 3 or 4 times in one decade.

"Advertising is essential to Pacific Coast prosperity," he said. "We are isolated from the rest of the world by oceans and mountains, which are still somewhat of a barrier, but we have overcome much by advertising."

Miss Alice Irwin of the Los Angeles Club spoke on the "Woman's Viewpoint of Advertising." She said, "the primary function of advertising is to sell goods and the secondary function is to educate."

Walter Weohlke, editor of the Sunset Magazine of San Francisco, said in an address on "Why Advertise a Community?" that the sole reason a community should advertise is to stimulate its growth. The community that advertises must offer something to induce the purchase of what it has to offer, he said.

Paul S. Armstrong, advertising manager of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, declared that there is no question but that newspapers in the aggregage stand far in the lead of all other advertising media.

"No advertiser can afford to ignore the newspapers. All advertising media are good, but some are better in particu-

FLYNN LAUNCHES NEW ST. LOUIS DAILY

American, Published Mornings and Sundays is English Edition of Amerika, German Paper—Has No Editorial Page

St. Louis, May 26.—The St. Louis American, St. Louis' new morning newspaper, made its first appearance Friday, May 23. The American is published by Col. J. D. Flynn, who is well known in the Oklahoma publishing field. The paper is the English edition of the Amerika, a German language newspaper which has been in existence 52 years.

Glenn Ross, formerly with the Tulsa (Okla.) Press, Muskogee (Okla.) Phoenix, and Fort Smith (Ark.) Southwest American, is business manager of the paper; R. A. Woolford, formerly of the Kansas City Journal is advertising manager, and Floyd G. Bryan, formerly of the Tampa (Fla.) Tribune, is circulation manager.

Ashley Green, formerly with the New York American, is city editor, and Fuqua Turner, formerly with the old St. Louis Republic, is Sunday and feature editor.

The American has the wire news service of the Universal Service and the United News. The Sunday paper was without a colored supplement. The paper daily for 2 cents, and Sunday for 5 cents.

"A Newspaper With a Heart and Soul for the Hearth and Home," is the American's slogan. Col. Flynn says that he is a Republican, but "the paper is not concerned in politics as much as it is in principles."

The American has no editorial page. Its only editorial comment is a column—the first on page one, which is called "Keeping People Posted," by Col. Flynn. These are short paragraphs devoted to local subjects.

The Daily Record, a court paper, carried an announcement of the sale of 2,000 share of stock of the Amerika Publishing Company, by G. S. Pollard, pledgee, at the east door of the Court House next Friday at noon. This stock was purchased by Flynn from Pollard, who was president of the publishing company. Col. Flynn declined to discuss the matter.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

COPYRIGHT 1924 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER—ALL RIGHTS, INCLUDING FOREIGN RIGHTS, PROTECTED.

The result of his enterprise exceeded Mr. Bennett's fondest expectations and we quote his editorial published near the close of 1836, in which he said:

"The surprising success of the Herald has astonished myself. I began on $500, was burned out, once had my office robbed, have been opposed and calumniated by the whole newspaper press, ridiculed, contemned, threatened, yet here I am, at the end of 15 months, with an establishment, the materials of which are worth nearly $5,000, nearly all paid for, and the prospect of making the Herald in two years produce a revenue of at least $30,000 a year; yet I care not. I disregard, I value not money. I rise early, and work late, for character, reputation, the good of mankind, the civilization of my species. It is my passion, my delight, my thought by day and my dream by night to conduct the Herald, and to show the world and posterity that a newspaper can be made the greatest, most fascinating, most powerful organ of civilization that genius ever dreamed of. The dull, ignorant, miserable, barbarian papers around me are incapable of arousing the moral sensibilities, or pointing out fresh paths for the intellectual career of an energetic generation."

His enterprise as a publisher was remarkable. Though he could ill afford it, yet when the great fire in December, 1835, destroyed the Merchants' Exchange and adjoining blocks of buildings, causing a loss of over a million dollars, he had a picture and a map specially engraved at heavy expense, and again on March 19, 1836, he published a large map of New York City, on which all his numerous advertisers' locations were noted. Of this issue, he sent out an "extra edition of 10,000 to all points," though it severely strained his resources.

The rush of business in the spring of 1836 so overwhelmed him that his cellar at 148 Nassau street had to be abandoned and on April 9 he removed to a large airy office on the first floor of the prominent Clinton Hall building, corner of Nassau and Beekman streets. Here he installed a full modern equipment, bought a safe and a second-hand mahogany counter, while in rear was his "den" or sanctum, where he could retire to pen his brilliant editorials. Over the door was a large sign bearing the words "Herald Office" and still further impressing Day and Wisner of the Sun with the proximity of their dangerous rival.

By August the circulation had increased so much and the newsboys were selling the Herald at such extortionate figures, that he raised the price to two cents a copy at retail. His patrons willingly paid it, and as he remarked to an old medical friend, "the whole city reads the Herald and my presses are taxed to the utmost to supply the demand."

Mr. Bennett had only a few enemies—they were his competitors in business and the political and financial evil-doers whom he struck with lightning-like effect—while he had hosts of friends, several of whom demonstrated it most impressively in September, 1836, when Mr. Bennett was fined $500 for accidentally publishing the name of John Haggerty in a list of insolvents. He promptly paid the fine and the next day his friends raised a similar amount and presented it as a testimonial to him that he was "an honest, fearless editor."

The Hamblin Assault

After the burning of the Bowery Theatre in the latter part of 1836, Thomas S. Hamblin, the manager, was practically ruined, and his friends planned a monster benefit for him. This was strongly opposed by Mr. Bennett in several caustic articles as unnecessary, with the result that both Hamblin and his associates became infuriated, and finally went to the Herald office and personally assaulted Mr. Bennett in his private office. Mr. Bennett manfully resisted, but was badly beaten, his furniture wrecked, and, worst of all, during the melee, someone went to the cash drawer and stole more than $300. Mr. Bennett justly denounced Hamblin in the bitterest terms, while the latter and his friends were championed by practically all the other papers in town, and Noah in the Star dwelt on the fact that retribution had at last overtaken Bennett and that he richly deserved punishment. Col. Webb also gloated over the disaster that had befallen "the scoundrel, Bennett," for a few days before the Herald had branded the Courier and Enquirer as "that trough of infamy." On February 27, 1837, Hamblin and his associates in the outrage were tried, found guilty, and made a monetary settlement with Mr. Bennett, though prior to that, the defenders of Hamblin had insinuated that an employe of the Herald, taking advantage of the confusion, might have committed the theft. It is only fair to say that in 1850, Mr. Bennett publicly announced his regret at the incident and appealed to the public to aid Hamblin in his effort to save the Bowery Theatre from foreclosure at that time.

Two Famous Herald Editors

The year 1837 was notable in the annals of the Herald, due to Mr. Bennett employing two men who became famous as journalists and were loyal and able workers in the Herald's editorial department and greatly aided the proprietor in his labors. They were William H. Atree and Frederic Hudson.

Probably no one was more relied upon by Mr. Bennett as an editorial assistant than William H. Atree, of whom he once remarked:

"Bill Atree possesses many of my qualities; he has sound judgment, fearlessness, is absolutely accurate in his reports, and is a brilliant writer withal."

Atree arrived in the United States in 1834, and secured employment in Conner's type foundry. His occupation proving uncongenial, he resigned and became a reporter on the Transcript, at much smaller wages than he had been receiving. He enlivened its columns with his witty and realistic police court stories, rapidly raising its circulation, and incidentally rousing the envy of Day and Wisner of the Sun, who so grossly libelled him that he obtained their indictment. The Courier then offered him a largely increased salary, which he accepted, and on joining its staff, at once began a series of studied attacks on certain individuals, resulting in his being waylaid and so severely beaten that a fatal result was feared. Even the Sun expressed indignation and aided in trying to discover his assailants. Disgusted with journalism, on his recovery, Atree went South to carve out a fortune in the new territory of Texas, from which he sent interesting letters to the Courier. Mr. Bennett got in touch with him after his adventures in Texas and Mexico and brought him back to New York as the Herald's first news editor, a connection which he retained until 1844.

Frederic Hudson came from Boston to New York in 1836 with his brother to seek employment, and in 1837, as a youth of 17 years, was hired by Mr. Bennett as messenger and office boy. He had the benefit of what was considered a good education in those days, having graduated from the famous Mayhew School, and to great aptitude he joined the reportorial "nose for news." He became an active and willing assistant to Mr. Atree and his subsequent rise to become the director of the Herald's editorial staff and his elevating of the tone of the paper to the dignified attitude it gradually assumed in the discussion of politics and the news is fully dwelt upon elsewhere.

Another selection of Mr. Bennett's for his editorial staff did not turn out so satisfactorily. A man around whom was thrown the charitable cloak of anonymity and was later referred to as "Ariel," was a remarkable character, talented and brilliant as a writer, but absolutely untrustworthy in private life. Holding the responsible post of chief editorial assistant and doing some excellent work, it was discovered that he had developed kleptomaniac traits and so flagrantly betrayed the confidence of his employer that he was summarily discharged. He had been stealing anything in the office that he could conveniently conceal and carry to his lodgings, including even the spermaceti candles then used for lighting purposes. His rooms were searched and heaps of uncatalogued articles belonging to the Herald were found and restored.

"Ariel" died soon after his discharge and Mr. Bennett not only condoned his faults, but actually provided for his impoverished family.

WHILE the whole journalistic world has marvelled at the circulation growth of The News, New York's Picture Newspaper, it has not given sufficient thought, perhaps, to the parallel increase in advertising rates. The News recently issued its seventeeth rate card. In less than five years its rates have increased from 20 cents a line to $1.10 a line—and with every change the rate per line per 1,000 circulation has decreased.

Thus the use and promotion of Chicago Tribune features has helped to build up not only the largest newspaper circulation in America but has caused a steady increase in advertising rates. Features offered by The Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate are carefully selected and intelligently edited to build circulation for The Chicago Tribune and The News of New York—both noted for their outstanding success. These features are not created to peddle for profit but, primarily, to build up the circulation and prestige of The Tribune and The News. Other newspapers in the United States and Canada may obtain these features at a modest cost.

The Sunday News of New York added 150,000 circulation by adopting an eight-page tabloid comic section. This comic section is available to other publishers at a moderate price. Why not buy the complete set of features used by The Chicago Tribune and the News of New York?

"Let the Next Witness Be Called"

Advertising media are always on trial. Circulation figures are convincing only in so far as they are supported by A. B. C. audit. The publisher's claims of market coverage and consumer influence find credence only when they are confirmed by the testimony of advertisers who have paid the bills for space and checked the records of their sales department. Past performance and consistent delivery of value received weigh heavily with the jury.

The Cincinnati Times-Star claims a daily city circulation reaching four out of every five homes in greater Cincinnati. The Audit Bureau of Circulations places this at 109,150 copies net. This is 22,734 copies more than the second evening paper and 67,271 copies more than the unaudited statement of the publisher of the leading morning paper.

The Cincinnati Times-Star claims to be the buyers' guide for its field. Display advertisers both local and national testified to this last year by placing in its columns 11,710,139 lines of display advertising, an excess of 4,481,358 lines over the second evening paper and of 2,192,708 lines over the leading morning paper, including its Sunday magazine edition.

Times-Star leadership in circulation and in display lineage has been consistently maintained without a break for sixteen years. It is greater today than at any time in the past.

A. N. A. E. TO CONSIDER ALL PHASES OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING

Frank Carroll Announces Complete Program of 3 Day Columbus Joint Convention With Classified Men —Prominent Speakers Listed

NEWSPAPER advertising will be discussed from every angle by a host of prominent speakers at the annual convention of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, Columbus, O., June 9, 10 and 11, the program for which was announced this week by Frank T. Carroll, advertising manager of the Indianapolis News, president.

F. T. Carroll

The convention meetings will be held in the Assembly Room of the Deshler Hotel, Columbus, in conjunction with the sessions of the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers.

The program follows:

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 9.

Registration 8.00 a. m. to 10.00 a. m.

Opening Session, 10.00 a. m.

The Hon. Vic. Donahey, Governor of Ohio; James J. Thomas, Mayor of Columbus, and Robert F. Wolfe, publisher of the Columbus Dispatch and the Ohio State Journal, will address briefly a joint session of the two associations on Monday morning. After these addresses the classified managers will start their separate meetings, while the members of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives will hear reports covering the activities of the past year, announcement of committee members and other business matters.

MONDAY AFTERNOON, LOCAL DISPLAY ADVERTISING.

These sessions will start at 2.00 o'clock, and be devoted to local display advertising problems. The principal speakers will be Joseph B. Mills, publicity director of the J. L. Hudson Company, large department store of Detroit, whose subject will be "Department Store Advertising from the Inside," and James W. Fisk, merchandising counsel of the Milwaukee Journal, who will cover the subject, "The Service a Newspaper Should Give in Selling Retail Advertising."

"Is it Good Policy to Publish Special Editions in Order to Maintain Lineage Even if They are Not Profitable?" H. W. Roberts, advertising manager, the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"Effective Contests for Newspaper Advertising Salesmen," Ralph Hirsch, advertising manager, the Ohio State Journal.

"Effective Methods of Securing and Developing Good Local Display Salesmen," W. E. Donahue, local display advertising manager, the Chicago Tribune, and A. L. Poorman, advertising manager, the Providence Journal-Bulletin. Two speakers were assigned to this subject on account of its unusual importance to newspaper advertising managers.

MONDAY NIGHT ENTERTAINMENT

All registered members of the A. N. A. E. and the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers, and registered guests, will be entertained at a theatre party at the Keith Theatre on Monday night. Official Badge will admit bearer to the theatre.

TUESDAY MORNING, NATIONAL ADVERTISING.

Three formal addresses will feature the national advertising session of Tuesday morning, starting promptly at 9.00 o'clock.

"Developing More National Advertising for Newspapers," Wm. A. Thomson, director, Bureau of Advertising, American Newspaper Publishers Association.

"The Iowa Idea—a Discussion of the Co-operative Advertising Placed by Iowa Newspapers," Harry T. Watts, business manager, the Des Moines Register and Tribune.

"Linking Newspapers and Window Display Advertising," Clyde P. Steen, secretary, Window Display Advertising Association.

Brief addresses will be delivered by 7 well known newspaper men, and time allowed for general discussion after each talk.

"Recent Developments of Merchandising Service and Merchandising Service Policies," Carl P. Slane, publisher, Peoria Journal Transcript, and G. R. Katz, E. Katz Special Advertising Agency.

"Methods of Enlisting the Support of Retailers and Wholesalers for Newspaper Advertising," Harvey R. Young, advertising manager, the Columbus Dispatch.

"Should Newspapers Sell Tie-up Advertising for Exclusive Magazine Campaigns," H. S. Conlon, advertising manager, the Grand Rapids Press.

"Should Newspapers Sell Tie-up Advertising for National Newspaper Campaigns," W. E. Donahue, manager local display advertising, the Chicago Tribune.

"Should Agency Contracts be Accepted for One Year from Date or One Year from the First Insertion?" Joseph W. Simpson, national advertising department of Philadelphia Bulletin.

"The Non-cancellable Contract as a Method of Protecting the Newspaper and Dealers when Merchandise is Sold upon the Promise of Advertising," W. F. Johns, advertising manager, the Minneapolis Journal.

TUESDAY, NOON.

Three separate noon luncheons will be held to give an opportunity for the discussion of special matters that can not have a place on the general program. One luncheon meeting will include representatives of all newspapers published in cities of less than 50,000 population. Another luncheon will be for representatives of morning newspapers, and the third luncheon for evening newspaper men. The chairmen of these meetings will be:

Harvey R. Young, advertising manager, the Columbus Dispatch, evening newspapers.

E. J. Treffinger, vice-president, the Richmond (Ind.) Item, morning newspapers.

Chas. L. Nicholson, advertising manager, the Hutchinson (Kan.) News, newspapers in cities of less than 50,000 population.

Representatives of the newspapers published in cities of under 50,000 may elect to attend the luncheons of morning or evening newspapers if desired.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON, CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING.

A joint session will be held on Tuesday afternoon, starting at 2.00 o'clock. The members of the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers will discuss vital classified advertising problems of particular interest to advertising managers, business managers, general managers and publishers.

TUESDAY, ENTERTAINMENT.

The women attending the joint convention will be entertained at a luncheon bridge at the Maramor, with service at 1.00 o'clock. An afternoon program is being planned by Mrs. Charles Hardin, Mrs. Harvey Young, Mrs. Ralph Hirsch, Mrs. M. R. Thomas and the other members of the Columbus committee. Suitable prizes are being donated by various Columbus retail stores.

The principal social event of the convention will occur on Tuesday night. Special cars will take the men and women attending the joint convention to Olentangy Park, Columbus, where a barbecue frolic will be staged. It will be strictly informal, and Ralph Hirsch, of the Ohio State Journal has already "tagged" a prize baby beef, and has arranged for a complete menu of a most attractive nature. After the barbecue, the extensive amusement park will be available to the delegates. The convention badge will entitle the wearer to rides on all amusement devices, to the dance hall, the swimming pool, prize fight and the numerous other attractions put on especially for the convention. A large section of the spacious dance hall will be reserved for the exclusive use of the members of the two associations and their guests.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 11.

This session, starting at 9.00 o'clock, will be devoted to problems that concern the general management of a complete advertising department.

Principal speakers will be David Gibson, publisher, the Lorain Journal, on "Newspaper Advertising Salesmanship," and Douglas V. Martin, Jr., promotion manager, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, who will speak on "How a Newspaper May Promote Its Own Sales by Advertising."

"Efficient Methods of Measuring and Billing Advertising Space," Fred E. Hussey, Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat-Chronicle.

"The Advantages and Disadvantages of the 12-em Column," Brent Williams, manager, service and promotion department, St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

"Analysis of Advertising Selling Costs," Don Bridge, manager merchandising and national advertising department, Indianapolis News.

"The Advantages and Disadvantages of the Pyramid Make-Up," M. R. Thomas, advertising manager, Columbus Citizen.

"Practical Rules Determining the Classification of Advertising as National or Local," Joseph W. Simpson, national advertising department, Philadelphia Bulletin, and J. K. Groom, director of national advertising, Northern Illinois Group.

"General Problems of Business Management," W. P. McKinney, secretary-treasurer, Marietta (O.) Times.

WEDNESDAY NOON.

Group luncheons will be held on Wednesday noon to complete the discussion of matters pertaining to the specific problems of the newspapers in the three general classifications. The same chairmen will take charge of the luncheons.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, BUSINESS SESSION

This session, starting at 2:00 o'clock, will be devoted to the business matters of the Association. Probably the most important feature of the meeting will be presentation of a Code of Ethics covering the selling and handling of newspaper advertising. Committees will report, policies for the new year will be discussed, and officers elected. This will be the final session of the convention.

WEDNESDAY, LADIES ENTERTAINMENT

Ladies attending the joint convention will meet at the Deshler Hotel at 10.00 o'clock Wednesday morning for an automobile ride around Columbus. The party will have lunch at the Columbus Country Club at 1.00 o'clock. Ohio State University will also be visited.

LUNCH CLUB SPEAKERS.

Members of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives will address the various luncheon clubs during convention week.

N. Y. Ad Men Plan York Memorial

Prominent New York advertising men are on a special commission just appointed by Mayor Hylan to present to the City of York, England, this summer a memorial to commemorate the naming of New York after the old English city. The commission, which will present the memorial in the old Guild Hall at York about the middle of July, includes: H. H. Charles, president of the New York Advertising Club, Frank Presbrey, Francis H. LAWRENCE PERRY

LAWRENCE PERRY, who writes sports exclusively for the newspapers served by the Consolidated Press, has just been chosen by the Encyclopædia Britannica to contribute the chapter on the status of world sports.

Lawrence Perry specializes on amateur sports. He began his career on the New York Sun and in 1906 went to the New York Evening Post, joining the Consolidated Press in 1920.

Lawrence Perry makes trips annually to various sections of the country acquainting himself with athletes and athletic systems. As a consequence, his sources of information are far-reaching. Some of Mr. Perry's exclusive stories in recent weeks included his interview with Chancellor Flint of Syracuse who defended the present trend of intercollegiate athletics, expert analyses of the winter indoor track meets, disclosures as to the increasing number of southern and western college baseball stars making good in the big leagues, and predictions regarding the Olympic trials which have been borne out by developments.

1,251,000 Individuals In

PENNSYLVANIA

Are Members of Building and Loan Associations With Assets of $624,000,000

PENNSYLVANIA, with a population of 9,106,000 (estimated 1923), leads the country with 3,316 Building and Loan Associations. This is over one-third of all those in the remainder of the country.

The market for household equipment and supplies is growing. Pennsylvania's workers are earning salaries and wages which enable them to accumulate assets in Building and Loan Associations alone of over $624,000,000. A fund like this giving these people homes of their own and home comforts is indicative of the wealth of Pennsylvania.

Reports from 1,636 banks in Pennsylvania show individual deposits in these banks amounting to $3,715,000,000. This is another reason why Pennsylvania offers trade advantages sufficiently attractive to manufacturers.

Pennsylvania is a producer, and with it comes a demand from its workers for goods of all kinds, and Pennsylvania's daily newspapers carry your message to these people.

These listed dailies are daily selling merchandise for National Advertisers through Pennsylvania storekeepers—these papers can help these men put the goods out for you.

DOMINATE PENNSYLVANIA WITH THESE NEWSPAPERS AND YOU WILL GET LEADERSHIP IN MERCHANDISING

EDITORIAL

RING OUR BELL!

IN the field of daily journalism, EDITOR & PUBLISHER has come to be a service station. What it accomplishes through its columns is generally known. What it does day by day for all those engaged in publishing and advertising, through specific request, is known to few. Perhaps we owe it to ourselves and to our friends to discuss this service and call down upon our heads more of this pleasant, wholly gratuitious "trouble."

Here are just a few specimens of EDITOR & PUBLISHER recent special acts of service to readers and advertisers:

Furnishing to an advertising agency, by wire, a comprehensive list of news agencies and American correspondents and picture concerns in Germany.

Giving a city editor the basis of defense against an attempt to force a revelation concerning the source of a story given in confidence.

Supply a publisher with a formula upon which to calculate his manufacturing costs and justify his rate claims.

Refereeing a question between newspaper executives concerning the salary one felt justified in drawing.

Supplying a newspaper with data concerning the total number of newspaper readers in the United States.

Locating for an advertising agency a newspaper named "The Herald," which used stationery which gave no city address. One of the commonest requests is for the address of newspaper men who have changed bases.

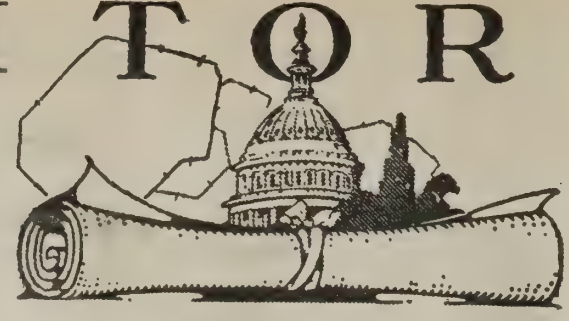
No week passes that we do not give a dozen or more leads as to agencies placing certain advertising accounts.

Space buyer's charts, market surveys, advertising and circulation statistics, are being constantly mailed, on request, and each week sees its quota of queries from agencies regarding local conditions of specific newspapers.

There is a constant flow of special requests regarding mechanical equipment, syndicate features, supplies of all kinds, and many of our friends insist upon having our opinion concerning such novelties introduced into the field as "rain insurance" and circulation schemes of all sorts.

"Newspaper at ——— declines to accept our advertising, without stating reason. Wire if newspaper is public carrier and compelled to publish legitimate advertising," was a telegram recently received from an out-of-town agency.

Compiling certain advertising statistics over a period of five years for a publisher in an income tax dispute.



We have numerous requests for authoritative books on special subjects in journalism. The Spring brought the usual bombardment of queer problems from journalism students, at work on their valedictory masterpieces. Our observation is that these young men are often over-loaded with information on editorial subjects and shy of sound information bearing on advertising, circulation and mechanical departments.

Job hunters are always with us and we earnestly do what we can to direct their oft nervous foot-steps; a bright young man put a sensible little liner, at half the rate, in EDITOR & PUBLISHER and had the grace to return last week and tell us that he had landed a job worth $9,000 per annum. A publisher in New Jersey who got a first-class managing editor through EDITOR & PUBLISHER also did us the honor of a telephone message of praise.

Within two days three prominent magazine writers, all former reporters, called at this office for data upon which to base articles. Each one, of course, came in with the preconception that the newspapers were going to the dogs and that monstrous conditions were being worked through mergers and "chains."

The countless special problems brought to our staff demand immediate and earnest attention. We want every reader to know that our natural advantage in possessing information of every description in the field of journalism is regarded as a part of our service and is at their disposal. If your problem concerns newspapers or advertising—ring our bell!

It seems to be the unanimous opinion of small, high-priced magazines that the road to circulation is newspaper muck-raking.

KINGS

CHAPTER III. 14

And if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and my commandments, as thy father David did walk, then I will lengthen thy days.

YOUR LITTLE PARTNERS

"DEAR Editor: Please help me to buy a pig." Years ago this serio-comic appeal was received by Arthur Capper, Kansas editor-senator, from a youngster living on a desolate farm. The child's wish was gratified and from one little pig came many and relative prosperity for a striving lad.

But the letter had more important effect. It was the start of the Capper Pig Clubs for boys and the Capper Poultry Clubs for girls. The Senator goes into partnership with the members of these clubs, lending them enough money to start pure-breed pens. Having loaned more than $100,000 without security, Mr. Capper recently proudly announced that he had not lost a cent through such financing, and has won the friendship of thousands of aspiring children.

Almost every newspaper publisher has business relations of the highest importance with boys and many understand and appreciate boy nature. There are few elements in newspaper publishing more delicate or more worthy of scrupulous attention, viewed either from good citizenship or from good business.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER puts the question: Are you in partnership with your newsboys? That word partnership means more than mere commerce. It means a common understanding of aims and sharing of benefits. It means close association and personal concern. From the publisher's side it means a real sense of fatherhood to a great number of dependent youngsters. From the boy's side it means duty. You may snap your fingers at many powerful antagonists if you have on your side the children of the town.

A knowledge of shorthand is one of the most valuable accomplishments of a reporter, all statements to the contrary notwithstanding. It is important to quote people correctly and the shorthand reporter, not ashamed to use his book and pencil, usually turns out the best story.

A GRACEFUL ACT

THE National Editorial Association paid a courteous and just tribute to Edward S. Bronson by electing him its president, well knowing that his delicate health would not permit him to actively serve. It was a recognition of the work that Mr. Bronson had done for the association, the latest feature of which was the brilliant excursion of the association into Mexico. His election was without precedent in the annals of the editorial organization and was made possible through the unselfish and sacrificing spirit of George W. Marble, who was re-elected vice-president who, as the acting president, will carry on the work of the office. EDITOR & PUBLISHER joins with the retiring president, Wallace Odell, and the members of the association in expressing appreciation of Mr. Marble's graceful act.

A newspaper publisher in the middle west writes that he is treating with silent contempt the threats of the K. K. K. to boycott his advertisers if the newspaper does not publish certain articles concerning foes of the klan. Another method would be to publish certain articles about the klan and see to it that they led conspirators to the place where conspirators belong.

NOT UNRESPONSIVE

"THE average publisher is very slow in expressing appreciation of anything," said Secretary H. C. Hotaling, at the Newspaper Editorial Association convention, but this is by no means the experience of EDITOR & PUBLISHER. On the contrary, we find newspaper publishers as a class highly sensitive to the requirements of good journalism and willing lavishly to patronize those who minister to it. We are ordinarily in agreement with the able secretary of the N. E. A., but in this instance we feel that he misstated a general conclusion to make a forceful, arousing argument for co-operation.

"Joe," Park Row boot-black, looked up and said: "Next Saturday I go back to Italy, to my father's house and work in vinyard. Work only little there and have wife and children in sun. Here work all time, get few dollars, pay landlord everything for dirty rooms in Allen street. You Americans work, work, work, but never breathe air. You all work crazy."

WRITING TALENT

HERE and there flashes of good writing!

News stories which comprehend their subjects without waste of words or ponderous, labored, self-conscious effort.

Lucid writing, a column length strewn with wit, epigrams, glistening description, easy conversation, by some one with sound understanding of the text.

It is the new literature. It is uncommon, for few are capable of expressing what they see and fewer still are able to articulate a sense of feeling.

Bring into journalism interesting people, who have something to say and know how to say it!

It is to the point in the discussion regarding the financing of newspapers through stock issues that the Minneapolis Daily Star, in which some 6,000 farmers and laborers purchased $750,000 stock, is in the hands of a receiver, largely by reason of quarrels over management.

SHOULD BENNETT RETURN?

FROM week to week we are giving our readers a taste of old-time personal journalism, through publication of the serial "Herald of the Bennetts." It is a fascinating story, bristling with adventures of "red-blooded men," but with the facts fresh in your mind do you now feel that journalism has lost through impersonality of editorship? Would those who deplore the passing of the "good old days" be much in favor of a return of James Gordon Bennett? We think he would lead a futile and desolate existence today.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

FRANCIS H. SISSON, former newspaper publisher, now vice president of the Guarantee Trust Company of New York, has had wide experience in the publishing and advertising field, his association with this line of work having commenced during his early school days in Galesburg, Ill., where he was born. He is a graduate of Knox College, and also of Harvard College, where he did post-graduate work.

F. H. Sisson

Sisson was formerly editor and publisher of daily newspapers in the Middle West, including the Galesburg (O.) Evening Mail and the Peoria (Ill.) Transcript and has been interested in various magazine and advertising activities since coming to New York 15 years ago. For several years he was vice-president and General manager of the H. E. Lesan Advertising Agency, of New York and Chicago.

Previous to his association with the Guaranty Trust Company, Sisson was prominent in railroad circles as assistant chairman of the advisory committee of the Association of Railway Executives, and in this capacity and in his editorial, advertising and banking experience he has written and spoken extensively on business and financial subjects.

In addition to directing the advertising activities of the Guaranty Trust Company, Sisson is chairman of the Public Relations Commission of the American Bankers Association, and also chairman of the executive committee of the association's trust company division.

Sisson is a member of a number of important economic organizations, including the Academy of Political Science. He also is a member of Phi Beta Kappa. He was given a degree of LL. D. by Knox College in 1921, and was made a Chevalier of the Order of the Crown by the King of Belgium in recognition of services during the war.

Payne First to Type A. P. Dispatches

John A. Payne, who died suddenly in Cincinnati on May 23, was in his earlier years employed as a telegraph operator by the Associated Press, and it is said he was one of the first to use a typewriter in copying press dispatches. The late Addison C. Thomas, then Central Division superintendent of the A. P., happened in the office of the old Nashville (Tenn.) American one day where Payne was working as operator, and noticed a typewritten piece of A. P. copy in a waste basket. He rescued it and learning that Payne was taking the report on the typewriter regularly sent him the various Associated Press offices to introduce the practice.

Ludlow helps you sell display advertising

"WE purchased our Ludlow in the fall of 1918. At that time it was very difficult to secure sufficient help and we were looking about for some more efficient means to handle our advertising than the old fashioned one-type-at-a-time method. The Ludlow System seemed to be the logical answer to the question," writes the Madison Courier, Madison, Indiana.

"When we changed from single type display to Ludlow display, we found it was not necessary to go through a long process of instruction to our help, as the operation of the machine is so simple that in a day or two it was running as smoothly as one might desire.

"After using the machine for almost six years, we have found it to be not only a time saver in setting advertising itself, but in make-up and lock-up of the forms. It has improved the typography and with the improvement in the appearance of the paper we have found it easier to sell advertising space, and we have increased our local display about fifty per cent. in the last four or five years. During the last few weeks we have been using the Ludlow to set italic headlines over news matter, and we find it quite an improvement over the old method of setting italic headlines. They are not only set faster, but they get a better face and look better."

as a group lead the country in many lines of endeavor and a wise advertiser or manufacturer will advertise a path to their door.

Statistics show that two-thirds of all the clocks, fire alarms, silver plated ware, corsets and ammunition manufactured in the United States are made in New England.

More than fifty per cent of all the brass made in the United States is produced in these states.

Nearly seven hundred places in New England can be termed manufacturing towns.

Here we find communities where intelligent, productive people have made permanent homes.

These people demand an enormous volume of merchandise every day.

The daily newspapers will move this merchandise from the dealers' shelves to the consumer, if only you will do your part and use adequate advertising space.

These New England dailies, covering the territory from the east to the west, and from the north to the south, will carry your message to the buying public of this territory.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

THIS election year Bob Satterfield, cartoonist, now with the Publishers Autocaster Service, New York, is having to think and draw three ways at once. For the first time, his syndicate has agreed to furnish publishers their choice in political cartoons. Satterfield, therefore, has to produce suitable cartoons for the Democrats, Independents, and Republicans.

BOB SATTERFIELD

A questionnaire has been sent out to clients by Publishers Autocaster Service, announcing the service and asking them to submit their choices. A. F. Harrison, sales manager, reports that the arrangement has been very favorably received and that many letters have reached him praising the plan.

Satterfield, who was formerly with the NEA Syndicate, is widely known as a cartoonist.

Release date for Gene Carr's new comic strip, "The Baxter Beasley's," has been set for June 2, the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York, announced this week. It will run daily with a full page Sundays.

The Scripps-Paine Service is removing its Pacific Coast headquarters from San Diego to 1126 Folsom street, San Francisco, Cal.

"The Improbable Success of Mr. Owen Hood," a short story by Gilbert K. Chesterton, is ready for release to newspapers June 15, by the Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate, Tribune Square, Chicago.

Mary Graham Bonner, children's feature writer for the Western Newspaper Union Syndicate, is at Emerald Lake Camp in the heart of the Canadian Rockies, gathering fresh material for her series, "Daddy's Evening Fairy Tales." During the past 9 years, Miss Bonner has written and published nearly 4,000 stories for children. In private life she is the wife of Eugene E. Early, publisher of the Jamaica (N. Y.) Queens County News.

Mrs. Alma Whitaker, special writer on the Los Angeles (Cal.) Times, has contracted to write a daily article for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York, on psychological philosophy. Mrs. Whitaker has become popular on the west coast and her connection with the New York syndicate will be her first introduction to a larger field.

Quarrel Over Editorials at Soperton, Ga., May End Fatally

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

SOPERTON, Ga., May 28.—Horace M. Flanders, editor of the Soperton News, was shot in the chest and seriously wounded last night by Crosby Williams, prominent Soperton merchant. Williams escaped, and has not been arrested. Flanders' condition is grave. Police officers are still searching for his assailant.

Williams shot Flanders for printing editorials which he said were hurting the town, according to the police.

New Bayonne Daily Planned

Michael J. Donovan, editor of the Bayonne (N. J.) Public Opinion, has announced his intention of starting a daily afternoon paper within 5 weeks. The purchase of equipment already is under way and construction of the new home has been started. Bayonne has two other papers, both published in the afternoon, the Times and the News.

New Ink Company Organized

Edmund E. Sinclair, for 32 years with the Sinclair & Valentine Company; and John J. Carroll, 16 years with the same concern, have formed a new company for the manufacture of printing and lithographic inks.

Summers to Edit N. Y. Bulletin

Snowdon H. Summers, for many years connected with the New York Evening Telegram prior to its present ownership, has become associated with Frederick W. Enright and Frank B. Flaherty, respectively publisher and general manager of the new New York Evening Bulletin, and will assume the post of editor of the Bulletin. Summers broke into the newspaper game on the Chicago Tribune, and came to New York while still, as he himself says, "very green and very cubby." He was with the Evening Telegram for nearly 14 years prior to the sale of that newspaper by the James Gordon Bennett estate to Frank A. Munsey, holding important executive positions for the last 12 years of that time. From assistant city editor he became telegraph editor, then city editor, and then news editor which desk he held during the world war. In 1917 he was made managing editor of the Telegram, which position he held until his resignation at the time of Mr. Munsey's purchase. For the last three years Summers has been writing advertising for United Artists Corporation.

XXXI—AUSTIN—Located by Its Natural Beauty

By HARRY R. DRUMMOND

AUSTIN, Tex., capital city of the largest state in the Union, is the official residence of the benevolent despot who rules more square miles of country than are contained in the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, South Carolina, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio and the District of Columbia by 3,310 square miles.

According to the 1920 census, collected by the Government of the United States, Austin had 34,876 people. In accordance with all Chambers of Commerce, the Chamber of Commerce of Austin, together with the city directory people "estimate" that there are 53,000 people now living in Austin, but a real investigator found out that there are approximately 39,000, divided into 8,850 families, occupying 8,277 residences and apartment houses, with emphatic emphasis on the residences.

There are 1,063 high class homes; 2,835 middle class homes;; 2,065 third class homes and 2,247 homes of the poorer class.

There are 45 manufacturing institutions in Austin, most of them rather small, employing, collectively 1,037 persons, who were paid $1,470,000 in wages during the year. This gang of huskies turned out $4,996,000,000 worth of merchandise from these factories last year.

There are 38 jobbing houses in Austin, and their combined turnover was something in excess of $15,000,000.

The retail portion of Austin is on three streets. Congress avenue is the big bet. It runs for one mile, leading from the river to the State House, and is a clean, roomy wide street, the "main street" of the city. Sixth street, Lavaca street and Guadelupe street, each for one half mile, are retail streets, but, in reality "side streets." However, they have many good stores on them.

There are 7 department stores in Austin. Collectively they do some $7,000,000 a year, and the combined retail turnover of the city is about $20,000,000 annually.

Scarborough's is the largest and best store in the city. Adam Johnson is second, both in quality and volume, Rosner's third, Warren's fourth, Ludeck Moffett fifth, Bohn Bros. sixth, and Penny's seventh, both in volume, quality and standing in the community.

The merchandise offered for sale in Austin is, for the most part, of good quality. There is a preponderance of what is known as "good trade" in the city, and it is catered to in very good shape by the merchants.

There are 278 miles of streets in Austin, 22 of which are paved, which indicates that paved streets are comparatively rare.

The International Great Northern, Southern Pacific and Missouri, Kansas and Texas railroads connect the rest of the world with Austin, furnishing adequate and ample transportation facilities. There are five national highways passing through Austin, making it a port of call for motorists, and also making it easy for residents of surrounding territory to reach the city easily—incidentally contributing to Austin's retail prosperity.

It is interesting to learn how Austin "happened." Back in 1836, when Texas, just freed from Mexican oppression, was a Republic, there was a commission appointed to find the most beautiful spot in Texas and there to locate the capital of the state. That is how Austin was located where it is.

It has been shown that, as a manufacturing center, Austin is not so much. The reason Austin exists is that it is the political headquarters. This, too, accounts for several otherwise curious things one sees in Austin.

The stranger, unacquainted with circumstances, walking up (or down) Congress street, might think that Austonians are different from other folks. This because of the large number of pompous, queerly dressed "statesmen" one sees on the street. Peace, brother, they are not, for the most part Austonians. They are, for the most part, "statesmen" from all over Texas who foregather in Austin to advise with Governor Pat M. Neff as to how to run the weighty affairs of the state, and how to make the proper appointments.

You see Texas "statesmen" take themselves very seriously, and must dress the part—or the "commun peepul" would not know they are "statesmen." It is a good idea, too, for, in a great many instances it is the dress alone that identifies them.

When a "statesman" eventually yields to the incessant murmur of his constituents and "accepts" and office which necessitates his being in Austin, either for a session of the legislature or during a political term, he is impressed with the living conditions and, provided he can afford it, he establishes a residence in Austin, there to live, handy for the Governor to call on him for advice, and, basking in the reflected glory of a great past, really enjoy life.

That is why there are so many beautiful homes in Austin; why Austin is prosperous beyond all statistical data, and why Austonians, particularly the ladies, are such good looking, well dressed, snappy affairs.

Texas "statesmen" almost invariably wear the uniform made famous by the late Thomas Nast and the happily present John T. McCutcheon—long black coats, wide, soft black hats, long hair, turn down collars, string ties and a deeply serious look—you know—the regulation vaudeville make up.

But their women folks will none of that. They, bless 'em, want the new and they get it, for, by jimminy, a man may run a government, but he does not run his wife nor his daughter—particularly the daughter.

However, the chief industry of Austin is the government, and the Capitol is the biggest and finest building in the city, being 317 feet high, covering six acres, costing 3,000,000 acres of Texas land, and having been built of Texas granite.

Texas, amongst other things produces great quantities of nuts. That is, the peanuts, pecans, walnuts and such, and one room of the Capitol is given over to an exhibition of Texas' agricultural products, including the various nuts. It is the one room in the Capitol that contains no oil paintings of "statesmen."

The University of Texas, with more than 4,000 students, the State School for the Deaf, with nearly 500 students, the State School for the Blind, with 250, St. Edward's College and St. Mary's Academy with more than 400 students, together with the Highlands Private School for Girls and the Austin Military Academy, all located in Austin, afford a "college town" atmosphere that adds to the charm of the city.

There are 26 churches, 2 high schools, and sixteen grade schools in the city; 7 theatres (movies), and, all in all, Austin is a market worth being placed on the commercial map as a port of call, and a pretty good one.

One point worthy of mention, and indicative of the high class trade in Austin, is the fact that the "Walk Up and Save Ten" and credit clothing stores have never been able to make a go of it there. They simply cannot get enough support to make expenses.

Which indicates a rather high order of intelligence, by and large.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

Edwin J. Clapp: Keep in constant touch with authorities.

FROM economist to editor—is this one of the latest rules of progression in the journalistic profession?

One notices it at least in two instances in New York City, where Edwin Jones Clapp, one time professor of economics, later consulting economist, is editor of the New York American and Walter Lippman, a writer on economics and politics, occupies the editorial chair of the New York World.

Edwin Clapp, although he doesn't say so, gives the impression that it undoubtedly would be a good rule to adopt. He has been editor of the American only since January of this year, and has been in newspaper work but a brief 3 years. He is 43 years old. After a life of scholarly leisure, the rush of newspapering still rather appalls him.

"Certainly there is no other profession in the world that requires as broad an education as journalism," Mr. Clapp remarked to me this week. "But unless you have acquired your roots beforehand," he added, "I don't see how you can ever get them in newspaper work. One is kept so continually busy reading current newspapers and magazines, it is difficult to find time for the necessary real hard study."

Mr. Clapp's 3 years of newspaper work, when he was financial editor of the New York American, put him into the news spirit. He believes in varied interest on the editorial page, which he would keep as up-to-the-minute as the news columns; he believes in going direct to sources for facts, not depending entirely on published matter read and digested in the seclusion of the editorial sanctum; he believes in writing down to the masses; and he believes in the psychology of typographical make-up.

Not only should the editorial page keep pace with published news, but, as far as possible, it should forge ahead, seeking new facts and new angles by personal reporting on the part of the editorial writers, in the opinion of this energetic newspapermaker. To this end he invariably utilizes his wide acquaintance, going or telephoning direct to experts to talk over their ideas and plans, before writing an editorial on an important subject.

"Talking with people, I believe, is the best way for an editor to keep pace with the march of events," Clapp declared. "I like to keep in constant touch with authorities. That is the beauty of being editor in a city like New York. There is somebody always within easy reach who is an expert on something, to whom one may talk, gaining fresh ideas and viewpoints, before they are written down."

After talking to experts, Clapp comes back to his tiny office in the American building, 238 William street, New York, and "talks off an editorial" into a dictaphone. It was thus I found him early this week.

"I became used to the dictaphone while I was a professor," he explained. "Now I can neither write nor typewrite fast enough to keep up with my thoughts."

Mr. Clapp still has about him the calm, unharried professorial air. He has kept his young appearance, and there is none of the negligence in dress common to working newspaper men. His face, smooth-shaven and with regular features, is sunburned from a month's vacation just spent on his cotton plantation in Texas.

He was asked about his experiment in cotton planting, which has created quite a stir throughout the southwest.

"Arthur Brisbane and I went down to Fort Worth last November," he explained. "I fell in love with the place and purchased a half-section of land and have an option on another half-section.

"My wife is really the one who is making the experiment. We have hired 3 farmers, whom she manages. We have a couple of tractors and a stable of riding horses. During the past month, we have just planted 250 acres, and since the part of Texas we selected is singularly free from the boll-weevil, we expect very good results."

Although not trained in the ordinary newspaper school, Clapp's education and subsequent experience has been rather more detailed, more varied, and more exhaustive.

He came to the east from Wisconsin. Graduated from Yale with the class of 1904, he first went out on the road selling ammunition. In 1907 he went to Germany to complete his studies, being awarded his Ph. D. degree from the University of Berlin in 1910. Returning to Yale, he became an instructor in political economy. He held this position one year, then transferring to the School of Commerce, New York University, becoming there assistant professor of trade and transportation.

For the next 2 years he was special commissioner for the Board of Directors of the Port of Boston, coming back to New York University as economics professor, in 1914, and remaining until 1920. From 1918 to 1919 he was also chief of the economics section of the Information and Education Service, of the United States Department of Labor.

Gibbons Lectures in Paris

Floyd Gibbons, director for Europe for the Chicago Tribune, addressed the American Club in Paris, May 8. He described his recent trip in North Africa, across the Sahara to Timbucktoo.

Winchester, Tenn., Has New Weekly

Thomas C. Price, recently editor and owner of the Lincoln County (Tenn.) News, started publication of the Winchester News, a weekly, May 22. Associated with him is J. N. Martin.

"PRECIOUS STREAKS OF FINE GOLD"

"THE newspaper business is not a romance. It is just a plain, workaday, business world, warped a little, perhaps, with none too firm foundations, hungry for young life, but filled with uneven, precious streaks of fine gold, that remains after the dross has been washed away."—Philip Kinsley of the Chicago Tribune staff.

NEWS INTERPRETATION VS. SPEED

"I BELIEVE the time is coming when newspapers of the world will not lay so much stress on the lightning flashing of news events as they will on the interpretation of the significance of those events. That was the purpose of newspapers several decades ago and I'm convinced that they will revert to it."—Sidney F. Wicks, Manchester Guardian.

POUNDING THE BIG BASS DRUM

"PRICE is to the average advertisement like the bass drum is to the band. It's always at the tail end, but the band wouldn't be complete without it. Yet the mere pounding of the drum wouldn't mean anything without the music that accompanies it. Before price means anything, it must be accompanied by description."—Albert W. Stone, of the Denver (Col.) Advertising Club.

COPY TRANSCENDS ALL "SERVICES"

"BUT merchandising service, trade research investigations, and surveys count for naught if the advertising copy is not all that it should be. Given my choice I would prefer good copy, and the proper dealer and consumer appeal, and that combination will sell more goods than all the merchandising help and publicity together. The wise advertiser can have both—and that is where a good advertising agency can and does help."—William H. Rankin, President, William H. Rankin Company.

"FAITHFUL AND ACCURATE"

"THE venality of which we hear so much from Europe does not exist in American journalism. No matter whom it hurts, the news cannot be suppressed. Nor can it be colored in the interest of a political party. Taken as a whole, the American press is not only independent, but it also strives to give its readers a faithful and accurate presentation of news, and to give both sides in reporting controversies and moot questions."—Herbert Adams Gibbons, correspondent and author, Boston.

KEEPING JOURNALISM CLEAN

"THE shyster reporter ranges all the way from the dumb-bell who cannot observe and who cannot tell what he does see and hear to the contemptible sell-out man. He must be driven out by the combined efforts of the public, other reporters and the editors. Reporters who are worth a sliver of type metal are proud to be reporters—they aren't ashamed of the title 'reporter.' And they don't try to disguise it by introducing themselves as 'special writers,' 'investigators,' or 'feature men.'"—Paul R. Leach, Chicago Daily News, speaking to Medill School of Journalism Students.

TO THE CARRIER BOYS

"A GREAT many young men are born with the fear in their hearts of meeting a stranger—say nothing about asking them to buy something—and the one big institution that is constantly taking the fear out of the young boy is the newspaper. In the newspaper the boy has a great chance to come up in life; to break forth from the chains of fear and bashfulness by trying to sell newspapers. Newspapers are one of the most important parts of a man's life, and there is something about a newspaper that seems to call for a young boy trying to climb the ladder of success to be the salesman—it is a fitting product for any boy to sell, and in the great life of today you will find men of the highest positions in the business world who started their career as newsboys."—Dr. Frank Crane.

SCHOOLS MUST RAISE INTELLECTUAL STANDARDS

"I SAY it is up to the schools so to form the taste of the young people that they shall loathe the trashy, sexy newspaper, the lying, cheating newspaper, the newspaper that present a picture of life in America that is false and poisonous. * * * When you give us readers that think most funny pictures are silly and most crime stories revolting and most of today's editorial too elementary, we shall throw up our hats in joy. * * * I believe, just as firmly as I believe in anything, that unless the schools are strengthened, unless America digs in for the battle against ignorance, against laxness of moral and intellectual fiber, on a scale that will dwarf all past fights against ignorance—unless the educational level rises in America, in another generation there will be no reader for the kind of newspaper I want to produce—not even for the kind of newspaper we produce today."—Marc A. Rose, Managing Editor, Buffalo News.

THE PROVINCE OF ADVERTISING

"ADVERTISING is not a magic word that can convert a decrepit retail establishment into a productive business overnight. * * * More often than not the merchant who complains that advertising doesn't pay is entirely correct, but the fault doesn't lie with advertising. It cannot bring people into the store, stand behind the counter and sell merchandise. It is capable of bringing prospective customers into a store, but its province ceases when they are there. Advertising will not sell an inferior article in competition with an honest product; it cannot camouflage values that are lacking. * * * The newspaper is unquestionably the best medium for retail advertising. It offers the largest possible circulation for the amount of money spent."—Don D. Patterson, Assistant Professor of Advertising, University of Missouri.

Farm and Factory Values

Indiana from a manufacturing viewpoint has $1,335,714,000 invested in 7,918 manufacturing establishments employing 329,000 persons—and expending $402,209,000 in salaries and wages. These establishments turn out products valued at approximately $1,901,000,000. Iron and steel, steel works and rolling mills constitute the most important industry. Slaughtering and meat packing is the second industry, with the automobile industry third.

Indiana's 200,000 farms are rated at $3,233,000,000. The value of all crops is approximately $500,000,000, with corn as the leading crop. It is by far the most important crop with value of practically two-thirds that of combined cereals. The value of domestic animals, poultry and bees is $261,264,000. Poultry is valued at $16,757,000; bees at $342,207.

Indiana ranks fourteenth among the States in the value of mineral products with a net value of $52,789,000. It ranks third among the States in the value of the limestone industry and sixth in coal production. Coal mining is the leading mineral industry of the State with an output valued at $60,820,000. Other minerals are valued at: Coke $27,302,000, cement $19,795,000 and petroleum $2,796,000.

Indiana is a productive territory for every National Advertiser and many are depending more and more upon these daily newspapers.

When you buy advertising in these Indiana Dailies you deal in known quality and quantity—they are the undisputed leaders in business getting.

VETO OF POSTAL WAGE INCREASE EXPECTED

Measure Approved by Congress Will Create $60,000,000 Deficit Is Belief —No Increase in Second-Class Rates

By Sam Bell
(Washington Correspondent, Editor & Publisher)

Washington, D. C., May 28.—The postal pay increase bill, passed by the Senate by a vote of 73 to 3 on Tuesday, has a two-fold interest for the newspaper industry. First the measure, which doubtless will be approved overwhelmingly by the House before the adjournment of Congress, threatens to result in an advance in postal rates, including second class matter; and second, the bill carries a rider providing for complete publicity for campaign contributions and expenditures.

As approved by the Senate, the bill sponsored by Senator Edge, who reported it for the Post Office Committee, will advance the salaries of postal employees approximately $60,000,000 annually. A draft bill prepared for the House provides advances totaling about $80,000,000, but there is every indication that the Senate bill probably will be adopted by the House or that a compromise measure will be reached in conference.

As the situation stands, there is ample indication that the measure will be vetoed by President Coolidge on the ground that the Government cannot stand the expenditure at this time, particularly as Congress has not provided the means of raising additional revenue within the postal service. Postmaster General New recommended that if the pay increase was granted second, third and fourth class rates—notably the parcel post service of the fourth class—be advanced to meet at least part of the deficit that would be created. The postmaster general's estimates that called for second class rate increases totaling about $5,000,000 annually were ignored by Congress. Senator Edge in reporting the bill to the upper house contended that the "question of raising the revenue to meet the additional expenditures incident to increasing the salaries of postal employes is one that should not be considered jointly with the salary bill," and members of the House Post Office Committee take the same view.

Actually Congress proposes at this session to advance postal expenses without increasing rates, in the hope that some way will be found to take care of the gigantic postal deficit at the next session. Mr. New has asserted that an increase in parcel post rates alone will not take care of the pay advances, and the only way to meet the situation will be to increase rates all down the line, excepting only rates on first class matter.

The three Senators who voted against the pay increase were Borah of Idaho and Fess and Willis of Ohio, all giving as their reason the necessity for Governmental economy. Senator Borah voted against the bill despite the fact the Senate accepted his amendment for full publicity for campaign contributions and expenditures.

In addition to providing for publicity during the campaign, the Borah plan requires publication of the amount of any deficit incurred and public announcement monthly thereafter of contributions received to make up the deficit.

Gannett Merges Maine Farmer With Portland Sunday Press Herald

Guy P. Gannett, president of the Gannett Publishing Company, of Augusta, Me., announces that beginning June 15th, the Maine Farmer, published in Augusta, will be combined with the Sunday edition of his Portland Press Herald.

The Maine Farmer is the oldest sectional farm paper in the country. The consolidation is in keeping with the policy of expansion pursued by Mr. Gannett since he bought the 2 morning newspapers in Portland less than 3 years ago and consolidated them into the Press Herald.

It is announced that the part of the combined Sunday paper devoted to the agricultural interests of the State will continue to maintain the same policy and standards of the Maine Farmer.

Collier's Moves Plant to Springfield

Beginning with the issue of June 7, Collier's Magazine will be printed in the plant of the Crowell Publishing Company at Springfield, O., instead of in New York. Editorial and business departments will remain in the latter city. The publication's change follows removal of many other magazines from New York, because of high labor and postage costs.

To Aid Pan-American Communications

To better methods of communication between the United States and all Latin-American countries, the Inter-American Congress on Electrical Communications was formally opened in Mexico City, Mexico, May 27. Through uniform regulations of communication, it is expected that closer and more cordial relations between the peoples of both Americas will be established and the ideals of Pan-Americanism will be promoted.

Averages for the General Administration expenses for three groups, however, are: Class A, 20.1 per cent; Class B, 18.1 per cent; Class C, 16.7 per cent. Payroll charges against this department, which should ordinarily include a salary for the working owner or employed general manager, and for limited clerical assistance, average 9.4 in Class A; 8.6 in Class B, and 7.5 in Class C. Extremes in this column, which would seem to permit of little latitude, are four-tenths of one per cent and 23.2 per cent.

Departmental expense under this heading furnishes a fine assortment of percentages, although the averages are not dissimilar. The average for Class A is 10.7 per cent; for Class B, 9.5 per cent, and for Class C, 9.2 per cent. The extremes, both among the smaller papers, are eight-tenths of one per cent and 22.5 per cent.

It might here be noted that one of the smaller papers is furnishing most of the extreme highs and lows. This paper runs 60.8 per cent as its mechanical department budget, and 1.2 per cent for its general administration expense.

Editorial expense in general is far less than one-half of that of the mechanical departments. In Class A, the editorial department consumes 15.5 per cent of the total income; in Class B, its proportion is 13.9 per cent; in Class C, it is 13.1 per cent.

Editorial payrolls likewise take a smaller proportion of the total income as the latter increases. In Class A, the editors and reporters receive 9.9 per cent of the paper's revenue; in Class B, their "take" is 8.2 per cent; in Class C, they draw 7.6 per cent.

Departmental expense, other than payroll, takes about the smallest toll proportionately from all of the papers analyzed. In Class A, it is 5.6 per cent; in Class B, it is 5.7 per cent; in Class C, it is 5.5 per cent. It may be presumed that more uniformity prevailed in this account than in some of the others noted, as the things for which an editor can spend money are more or less limited—wire service, features, mats, cuts, and photos, overhead, telegraph and telephone charges, postage, stationery and other incidentals.

The totals do not indicate that any of the papers listed follow the Scripps-Howard plan of charging to editorial expense the operation and maintenance of the composing room.

Advertising department expense is comparatively low and about the same proportion for all three classes. In Class A, the total is 7.6 per cent; in Class B, it is 7.8 per cent; in Class C, it is 7.1 per cent.

Advertising department payrolls are likewise low in all classes: 4.7 in Class A, 4.5 in Class B, and 4.5 in Class C.

Compensation to special representatives, as set forth, would indicate that, with few exceptions, these newspapers make national advertising a relatively small proportion of their volume. The special payment by Class A papers averages 1 per cent; by Class B, eight-tenths of 1 per cent, and by Class C, 1.3 per cent.

Other departmental expense is subject to the variation caused by lack of uniform standards, but the averages are, after all, not far apart—Class A, 1.9 per cent; Class B, 2.5 per cent; Class C, 1.3 per cent.

Circulation department proportions are lower on the two smaller classes than on the larger papers: Class A, 9 per cent; Class B, 9.3 per cent; Class C, 13 per cent. Payrolls of this department, which ordinarily include salaries to a subscription manager, and an assistant or bookkeeper and clerical assistance, average 5.8 in Class A, 5.7 in Class B, and 5.6 in Class C. Circulation department expense in Class C more than doubles the proportional averages of Classes A and B, the latter two being 3.2 and 3.6 per cent and the first, 7.4 per cent. Heavier promotion on the larger papers would appear to account for part of the bulge.

Less than 12 cents of every dollar received remain to the newspaper owner after paying all expenses (and the table does not indicate whether Federal taxes have been included in expenses or not; presumably they have not been, and will have to come out of the 11 or 12 per cent remaining after expenses are paid. The Class A expense totals an average of 89 per cent; Class B, 87.3, and Class C, 88.6. Five of the 61 newspapers listed indicate expenses greater than their revenues. One, in the unclassified total, shows revenues equalling expenses, though this might have been due to use of another base for calculation of expense than the assigned total income.

Auxiliary to the table and a by-product of its compilation are the last two columns—the net cost of advertising per inch in cents and the page cost composition for the last six months of 1923. How these were calculated the committee has not stated, probably because it was assumed that publishers knew. At any rate the committee shows that Class A newspapers produce advertising at a net cost of 22.2 cents per inch; Class B newspapers, 29.9 cents; Class C newspapers, 40.6 cents.

Page cost for composition runs $4.81 for Class A newspapers; $6.17 for Class B newspapers, and $7.13 for Class C newspapers.

Ship American Ad Exhibits:—Part of the American advertising exhibits which will be placed in the stadium at Wembley for the A. A. C. W. convention July 13 to 18 were shipped from New York May 29, on the S. S. American Banker. More will leave June 5, on the S. S. American Farmer. John Logeman, Chicago, is chairman of the international exhibit committee.

Rooms at the Exposition grounds selected for the American exhibition are the "most advantageous," according to Logeman. The American exhibit will be the only part of the exposition at which American products can be exhibited. Foreign exhibitors will utilize 10,000 square feet.

"It is the greatest thing for organized advertising that has ever happened, I think, to get that exhibit into the British Empire Exposition at Wembley," Logeman said.

To Establish American Headquarters:—The A. A. C. W. headquarters in London will be located in the Bush House, London, W. C. Bracket and Strand. All credentials and other data will be issued to delegates at the foregoing address. This headquarters will be established shortly after the arrival in London of Harry Tipper, chairman, and Earl Pearson, secretary of the international program committee, and John Logeman, chairman of the international exhibit committee, who will leave New York for England on the S. S. Harding, June 12.

Lord Riddle is After Golf Game:—Andrew Milne, convention secretary, in London, has cabled Richard R. Mamlok, New York, chairman of the international golf committee, as follows: "How many golfers can you get to accept the invitation of Lord Riddle all day Friday, July 11, at Walton Heath for stroke and foresome competitions with prizes? No team matches." Delegates who desire to accept Lord Riddle's invitation should write to Richard Mamlok, A. A. C. W. headquarters, 383 Madison avenue, New York.

In charge of Lancastria Program:—Lou Holland, A. A. C. W. president, has appointed C. M. C. Raymond, secretary of the Advertising Club of Los Angeles, chairman of the entertainment committee on the S. S. Lancastria.

Financial Ad Men Name Speakers:—C. H. Handerson, chairman of the Financial Advertising Association's program committee, on May 27, appointed the following speakers to address the departmental sessions at the convention: F. L. Blanchard, Henry L. Doherty & Co., New York, on "Investment Advertising"; C. F. Berry, Union Trust Company, Detroit, Mich., "Trust Advertising"; F. W. Ellsworth, Hibernia Bank & Trust Company, New Orleans, "Savings Banking"; and H. B. Grimm, Security Trust Company, Detroit, Mich., "Special Advertising and Merchandising Plans."

Feitel Succeeds Blumenstock

C. D. Feitel has been appointed director of sales and advertising for Stix, Baer & Fuller Dry Goods Company, St. Louis with the exception of the basement departments, which will be directed by E. H. Hosbour succeeding Louis Blumenstock, who resigned his position last month as advertising and sales director. Up to the present time, Mr. Feitell has been in charge of advertising for the men's departments.

lar instances. Newspapers are indispensable to advertising campaigns with an aspect of news value."

C. C. Milham, secretary of the All Year Club of Los Angeles, spoke about the various phases of community advertising. He told how San Diego created a tremendous increase in week-end visitors by means of newspaper advertising in Los Angeles, how Salt Lake City increased its tourist travel by means directly traceable to newspaper advertising, and how Los Angeles has attracted thousands of visitors to that city by newspaper and magazine advertising.

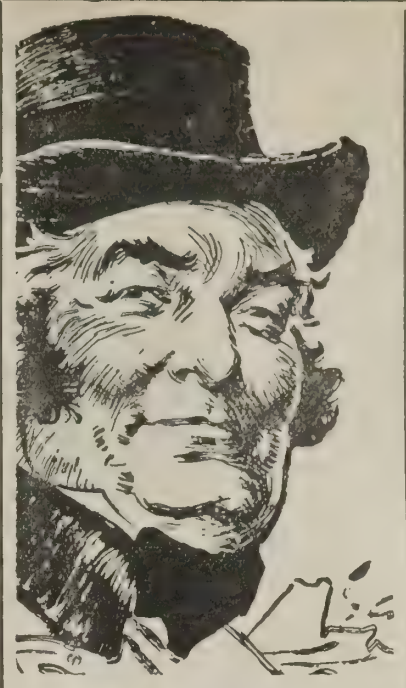
Vernon Churchill, representing the Honig Cooper Company of San Francisco, gave a presentation of newspapers as an advertising medium from the advertiser's standpoint.

"The welfare of 125,000 California homes as well as an investment of $600,000,000 in capital, is dependent upon the success of co-operative enterprises in California," said Ralph R. Merritt, president and managing director of the Sunmaid Raisin Growers.

Mr. Merritt said that there is no more important part in the maintenance of the prosperity of the nation than there is to be found in the maintenance of stable markets. And in this undertaking advertising, which creates and holds a continued appeal for the product, plays a role of leadership and responsibility greater than at any previous time, he said.

"Advertising clubs have taken the uncertainty out of business," said Paul Findlay, merchandising counsellor of the Honig Cooper Company of San Francisco.

Charles Everett Johnson, noted Chicago commercial artist and illustrator, declared that advertising generally has improved infinitely in the past 5 years and the average advertisement of today would rate at about 400 per cent out of a possible 600 points in appeal and artistry.



Special departments were conducted on the afternoons of the last 3 days of conference, as follows:—Advertising agencies, community advertising, direct by mail advertising, financial advertising, graphic arts, national and territorial advertising, newspaper, outdoor advertising, retail advertising, Better Business Bureaus, and advertising instruction.

H. A. Nater of the Los Angeles club won the trophy for the best 3 minute speech at the Monday luncheon on "What should an advertising club's activities include?"

A. L. Loomis of the Portland (Ore.) Advertising Club, and advertising manager Portland Telegram, won the 3 minute speaking contest at the luncheon on Tuesday. Twelve speakers took part. Mrs. Henrietta Dewalt of the San Francisco club was given honorable mention. The subject was: "What a community has a right to expect from its advertising club."

Lou E. Holland, president of the A. A. C. W., declared that if the National Vigilance Committee of the Associated Clubs were to release to the newspapers the information it has, there would be a great scandal, worse than that of the Teapot Dome.

A ball in the Californian, a banquet, automobile rides around Fresno and through the adjacent San Jaoquin valley were included in the entertainment features.

'JOHN BULL' takes its own medicine

LIKE all great national journals, "JOHN BULL" largely depends for its existence upon the Advertising it carries.

It receives much from advertising—but it also spends much.

There is not a weekly in Britain whose announcements loom so large in the public eye as do "JOHN BULL'S."

On every hand—everywhere—on hoardings, on flashing electric signs, in the pages of the press, "JOHN BULL'S" announcements appear. Thousands of London Tramcars carry on their rear-boards its weekly contents bills, which, also, are displayed on practically every newsstand and news agent's shop throughout Britain.

Britishers would not be allowed to forget "JOHN BULL"—even if they wanted to!

MULLIGAN URGES AD RATES WHICH PROMOTE USE OF NEWSPAPER SPACE

By ROSALIE ARMISTEAD HIGGINS

NINETY-SEVEN newspapers in 21 states. That is the list of Ralph R. Mulligan, special newspaper representative with headquarters in New York. Small papers to be sure, but a mighty interesting list at that. After meeting Mr. Mulligan, one feels that he might represent half that number again, and do it well. More than 6 feet in height, and strongly built, he suggests a human dynamo. Twenty-three years in the business of special newspaper representation have not lessened his enthusiasm. He radiates cheerfulness. As he talks, the merry twinkle in his blue eyes indicate that he has the true Irish sense of humor, while his hearty laugh is unmistakable evidence of the fact.

R. R. Mulligan

Mr. Mulligan was born and reared in New York, and received his first advertising experience there, starting at the age of 20 with R. A. Craig, special newspaper representative. He went into his business for himself in 1901, and since that time he has taken an active part in advertising circles. Mr. Mulligan was a charter member of the Six Point League, and has worked untiringly and unselfishly for that organization, having served as both president and secretary. He is chairman of the Directory Committee of the Six Point League, and has done a vast amount of work on the very valuable directory of newspaper advertisers and general advertising agents, issued by the League.

With his wide experience, he has some very interesting views on the many problems which comes up to his business.

"As we frequently find that advertisers, because they fed that advertising rates are increasing so greatly, are disposed to curtail the amount of space used, it seems that possibly it might be advisable for publishers to consider whether the situation could not be met by establishing rates that would serve to encourage the use of regular space inserted at regular intervals throughout the year, lower because of continuous insertion, than present flat rates," said Mr. Mulligan.

"Even though comparisons of present rates have shown that in most instances the advertising dollar of today purchases a larger volume of circulation, this fact does not seem to register in the minds of many advertisers, and it is the feeling that they are paying relatively more today that actuates them in reducing schedules.

"Large space advertisements have their value; the concentration of effort in short campaigns has its value also. To question an advertiser's policy who uses these methods may be carrying criticism into directions which the critic should not venture, with possibly a meagre knowledge of the facts. There is undoubtedly a definite purpose which the advertiser and his advertising counsel have planned that such a campaign will accomplish. But after all, if we look back over the files of the newspapers of several years or more, we seem to find this as axiomatic, that the campaign sustained throughout the year, or the greater portion thereof, is the campaign of the firm that was advertising then and now. Contrast the large copy advertisements of then and now, the advertisements of firms which appeared possibly in what would be considered an extensive campaign in a comparatively short space of time, and we do not find many of this type of advertiser as active today in the newspapers, which emphasizes the point that advertising employed continuously, like any other effort that is constant, is most likely to be successful.

"When we refer to the rate cards of newspapers of some few years ago, we find that the cards in those days were on the basis of a rate for a certain number of insertions or a rate for volume of space or a rate which was graded in its discounts by the frequency of insertion and the size of the copy.

"The publisher figured that he entered up the order and scheduled it over a considerable number of insertions in one operation, and whether the advertisement was large or small, it took about the same time to handle it, up to the time it was placed in the forms. Therefore, these savings were carried over into the rate card. It certainly was by no means a careful determination of rates in those days, for business was not conducted on the cost factors as ascertained by any thorough analysis.

"Today cost factors are, or can be closely determined. With labor cost already high and steadily increasing, it would seem that regular space, regular insertion of copy and possibly the question of large copy over small, might be handled in such a manner that would permit lower rates being made for such business."

Mr. Mulligan was asked whether the establishment of such rates would serve to develop advertising.

"I certainly think it would. Advertising that is continuous need not become stale. It is possible to incorporate in a moderate space, bright, interesting copy. Today the art of copy-writing, illustrating, and type display, together with the facilities of newspapers to give proper printing results has progressed so greatly that copy can be kept interesting and attractive. With schedules covering a protracted period of time, using set space regularly with the inducement to increase the average space used, there would be this advantage, the publisher would have a larger volume of steady business and be able to keep his paper within certain limitations of size. At the same time the inducement for the advertiser to advertise continuously would be there. After all, it is constant, steady repetition of the sales argument that sells goods.

"My thought there is this—that if more advertising could be handled on a regular basis of stated days of insertion and in fixed space, there not only would be less fluctuation in volume of business, but there would most likely be more business. By this is meant that the advertiser would do more business, and in the same respect that the advertiser profited from his increased volume of business, this would be an example for the non-advertiser and we might well expect that many more would be converted to the use of newspaper space."

TO DISCUSS NATIONAL COPY

Ad Managers of New York State Dailies Meet at Gloversville

Discussion of national advertising will feature the June session of the Advertising Managers of New York State Dailies to be held June 2 and 3, at Gloversville, N. Y.

Principal speakers will be Walter Sammis, assistant business manager of the New York Times, and Thomas H. Moore, associate director of the bureau of advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

The opening session will be called to order at the Eccentric Club, Gloversville, by President Frank A. Wood. Addresses of welcome will be delivered by John W. Sisson, Mayor of Gloversville, and Robert H. Stroud, manager of the Chamber of Commerce. The banquet will be held at the Adirondack Hotel, Wells, N. Y.

WIDE WORLD PHOTOS IN LARGER QUARTERS

Photographic Plant on Ninth Floor of N. Y. Times Annex Capable of Producing 3,500 Glossy Prints Daily

Averaging a daily turn-over of 3,500 glossy prints for newspaper reproduction, the new plant of the World Wide Photo Syndicate, New York, just completed, is an example of all that is best in this the "Picture Age" in the history of journalism.

The plant was inspected this week by EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

The 3,500 prints of more than 100 different photographs are turned out from four dark rooms, grouped about the work shop, the heart of this picture organization, occupying the ninth floor of the New York Times Annex.

Ten minutes after a picture is brought in from the street, it can be rushed through the various processes. Ten minutes later it is thoroughly dry and ready for mailing to clients.

Adolph S. Ochs, owner of the Times, takes great pride in showing visitors this department of his newspaper property. If the visitors are sufficiently distinguished, their pictures are taken in the private studio which is part of the plant's equipment.

An artistically decorated reception room is provided for callers. Hand-painted tiling lines the walls to the height of 4 feet. Gothic architecture is followed and the furniture is early English in style.

Hidden behind the elegance of this reception room, the wheels of the picture syndicate turn.

The work room, in charge of John Metzger, dark room manager, and also designed and built under his supervision, is the most thoroughly equipped department of its kind in the United States, World Wide officials claim.

Four developing stalls and four dark rooms are clustered about this main work shop, all of steel construction and well ventilated. Hypo tanks, even, are equipped with an overhead exhaust to carry away the fumes.

In the workshop also are 3 electrical drying machines designed by Metzger, which can be regulated to 3 different degrees of heat. Each machine is capable of drying one hundred, 6 x 8, or sixty-eight, 8 x 10 prints at one time. There is also one rotary drier to be used for rush work.

In a contiguous alcove stands the work table, where the 3,500 prints are sorted, identified, and the mimeographed captions attached. On the shelf above are 14 baskets into which pictures are placed for the foreign clients of the syndicate. The international aspect of the concern can be seen from the basket labels, which run, Bombay, Berlin, Copenhagen, London, Milan, Sydney, Rome, Paris, Melbourne, Madrid, Stockholm, Yokohama, Osaka, and Tokyo.

Just beyond this alcove is the syndicate's filing room. Walls are lined with shelves, holding photographic plates. More than 60,000 negatives are on file.

Frederico Boyd Dies in New York

Frederico Boyd, of Panama City, twice President of the Republic of Panama, who died suddenly in New York on May 25, started his career on his father's newspaper, the Panama City Star and Herald. From 1895 to 1903 he acted as correspondent fo the New York Times. Recently he had been president of the international tribunal, composed of representatives of his country and the United States, to decide questions involving the Panama Canal. Last month he was appointed as Minister to Belgium and Germany. Archibald Boyd, his father, an American of Scotch ancestry, went to Central America during the gold rush years ago, and remained to found the first English newspaper there, the Star and Herald.

International Paper Earnings Higher

Earnings of the International Paper Company for the first quarter of 1924 are estimated at $575,000 after all expenses and charges, Dow-Jones Company reported. It is also estimated that earnings for the first five months of 1924 are slightly higher than those reported for the same period in 1923.

One Motor Vehicle to Every Four Persons in IOWA

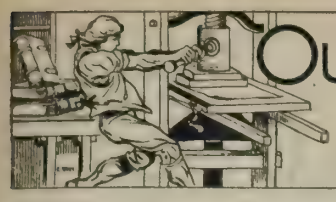
OWA is gaining in wealth faster than in population. That is why its 2,404,021 people have 571,061 automobiles or nearly as many as there are families.

Iowa ranks ninth in total registration with a gain of 70,903 or 14 per cent.

During the past year Iowans spent over $36,000,000 for gasoline for their automobiles alone, over $17,000,000 for tires, and over $5,000,000 for oil.

It is estimated that Iowa people will buy over 150,000 new cars this year.

With such a high percentage of automobile ownership, it is probable that the wealth of Iowa is more evenly distributed than that of any other state.



It is a pretty good thought to give the weight of your advertising to the territory that enjoys a reasonable degree of prosperity—and has enough money to spare to purchase many of the luxuries of life. Also where newspapers are read at home for the advertising as well as the telegraphic news.

Naturally the national advertiser who is alive and on the job will lose no time, but start after business in IOWA NOW.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

IN Oklahoma, a law has been proposed by which newspaper men would be required to take out a license which could be revoked for misbehavior. The comments about the proposed law have been numerous in the press. One of the best editorials on the topic appeared in the Nation for April 23. Evidently its writer believes that a license would not improve the ethics of the newspaper man any more than a license has raised the standard of practice for pawnbrokers. For once, many newspaper editors will agree with the Nation when it says:

> Journalism, with all its faults, is singularly free from pretense, hypocrisy, and humbug. A man may perhaps become a journalist too easily, but he cannot too easily remain one. In this journalism is like many of the callings that are most interesting and worthwhile. A good, even if probably apocryphal, story of the Emperor William has it that he once said scoffingly: "Bah! What diploma does a man require to become a journalist?" "Your Majesty," was the rejoinder, "what diploma does one need to become an emperor?"

"HOW the people of St. Louis choose their newspapers" is the title of a pamphlet now being distributed by the St. Louis Globe Democrat. The pamphlet seems to answer such questions as: Why do readers prefer one newspaper to another? What is newspaper dependability? Does clean news enter into the choice of a newspaper? Is clean news desirable as a neighbor for advertising? Do women have more time to read in the morning or the evening?

As a sort of introduction, the pamphlet quotes the following words of Charles Prestwich Scott, editor of the Manchester Guardian:

> The primary office of a newspaper is the gathering of news. At the price of its soul it must see that the supply is not tainted. Neither in what it gives, nor in what it does not give, nor in the mode of presentation must the unclouded fact of truth suffer wrong. Comment is free, but facts are sacred. Comment also, though free, must be fair.

EVART G. ROUTZAHN and Mary Swain Routzahn are joint authors of "Publicity Methods Reading List," a pamphlet which gives selected references on publicity in social work and kindred fields. Published by the Russell Sage Foundation, New York City, it is the most complete bibliography of literature relating to publicity that has appeared in type.

Especially valuable is the second part of the pamphlet. This section is devoted to publicity methods in such special fields as boy scouts, church and sunday school, community improvement, industrial relations, public health, and school and college.

THOSE who are going to London to attend the International Advertising Convention in July can get the British slant on the convention by reading "The Value of Advertising," a booklet which is being distributed with the compliments of the Yorkshire Observer. A postal sent to the Sentinel House, Southampton Row, London, W. C. 1, will bring a copy of the brochure.

CARL C. DICKEY, who until recently was connected with the Pulitzer School of Journalism, will publish shortly in the World's Work a series of articles on American newspapers. In these he will answer such questions as: Are our newspapers more honest than they used to be? Do they wield greater power than formerly? Which are the most fearless, the most timid? Have our daily papers really improved in the last few years? To what extent is big business represented in the ownership of big newspapers?

In view of the answers to these questions recently given by Mr. Villard in his book, "Some Newspapers and Newspapermen," this series of articles by Mr. Dickey is awaited with interest.

ELLIOTT BLUMENFELD, who was at one time on the staff of the New York Times, described "Fleet Street" in the Bookman for March. After pointing out that Fleet street in London is the shop of all who dabble in printers' ink—no matter whether the ink be used on a daily, weekly, or monthly paper—he calls attention to the places on the street of unusual interest to the American visitor.

He insists that Fleet street is not like any other street in London, nor like any other street anywhere. But he does admit that Park Row of New York has some of the inky atmosphere, even though there is much else on the Row that takes away the attention from the newspaper buildings.

He suggests that the American newspaper man who would catch the glamour and the glory that is Fleet street's very own, should visit the spot at night:

> And at eleven o'clock, when the first editions of the papers go to press, if you stand quiet on the pavement, you will hear a rumbling that grows and grows until it is a swelling roar; the very Street trembles as it gives birth to the millions of white sheets that are the Street's children. To those who love the game and the giant presses, it seems that the roar is but the echo of the thudding of men's hearts, the men who are Fleet Street.

Mr. Blumenfeld is the son of Ralph D. Blumenfeld, the American who edits the London Daily Express.

Texas Daily Wins Libel Action

The Houston (Tex.) Chronicle last week emerged victorious from a libel action for $10,000 instituted by Henry Thomas, when the Court of Civil Appeals at Galveston overruled a motion for hearing. The action was based on a story carried in the Chronicle in September, 1921, which said in effect that had Thomas, then sheriff, been in his office at a certain time a criminal would have been apprehended, saving the county the expense of a subsequent 3-year search for the man. The sheriff claimed the article a libel, intimating carelessness and nonfeasance in office. The court ruled against this claim.

Milwaukee Journal Starts Farm Page

The Milwaukee Journal claims that with its issue of May 10, it published the "first strictly farm page even issued by a metropolitan daily newspaper." Donald Ferguson, in charge of the farm department states the page has been established to keep Wisconsin farmers in touch with each other's activities. It is a "news" page and not a "farm trade" journal, he explains.

Germans Form Press Institute

To assist newspaper men, an institute for press science is about to be established in the Prussian State Library, Berlin. Conducted on strictly non-partisan lines, it aims to afford journalism students opportunities for practical research. The Association of German Newspaper Publishers has promised to furnish files of all German newspapers. There is also to be an extensive library of foreign dailies and of books bearing on the subject of journalism.

To Import Scandinavian Paper

Scandinavian Export Paper Company, Inc., 120 Broadway, a New York corporation has been formed to engage in the importation of Scandinavian newsprint paper. The company will be managed jointly by Harald Svenson, and Sven Belfrage, formerly with Holmens Paper Mill, Norrkoping, Sweden. The company will act as sole agents for Holmens Bruk Paper Mills, Norrkoping, Sweden. The address of the company will be 120 Broadway, New York City

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

A Canons of Journalism Amendment

To Editor & Publisher:

At Atlantic City I privately and casually proposed amendment to the "Canons of Journalism." Any amendment of this admirable code of ethics is serious business. Therefore I would not presume to urge the American Society of Newspaper Editors to any change except as there is a well concentrated agreement, not only on the issue itself, but also on the specific text proposed. I wish you might encourage a discussion of this question in your estimable paper Editor & Publisher. An open forum on the subject might clarify the atmosphere. Your own views would be particularly important.

You will remember the proposition I have presented. You will remember that Mr. James T. Williams, Jr., of the Boston Transcript, chairman of the Committee on Ethical Standards, reported the proposed amendment to the last Convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors without recommendation. He presented it, however, in a very fair and friendly way and suggested that the reason for reporting it without recommendation—one way or the other—was the absence from the Convention of some of his committee members.

My proposition is that there is one glaring omission in the basic fidelities imposed upon American journalism by the code of ethics. Although we are known as the "Fourth Estate"—a title which specifically recognizes our responsibilities as an unofficial arm of government—there is not a word in our national code which specifically accepts this responsibility and drives it home. My thought is that the code should be amended at the end of its first paragraph. Following this sentence—" To its opportunities as a chronicle are indissolubly linked its obligations as teacher and interpreter"—I suggest a new sentence reading as follows:

"To its privileges under the freedom of American Institutions are inseverably joined its responsibility for an intelligent fidelity to the Constitution of the United States."

American journalism is one of the greatest beneficiaries of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. I submit that a journalistic code which fails to acknowledge this debt is incomplete. The Constitution is a target of constant attack. I do not refer to controversial questions of interpretation. I refer to fundamentals—the structure of the government itself—the genius of representative institutions—the heart of representative democracy as necessarily opposed to pure democracy. In such uncertain times as these in which we live it is vital that any proposed constitutional changes should have the benefit of the most intelligent illumination and the most solemn deliberation lest either ignorance or prejudice shall meditate the invasion—ultimately the destruction—of the entire theory of American Constitutional control. The responsibility for illumination and deliberation rests primarily upon American journalism. No American newspaper is fit to be called "ethical"—in a correct interpretation of that word—which fails this duty.

We present this "code" to schools of journalism up and down the country. The prospective journalist is told that he can find in this code the sum total of his "ethical" responsibilities in the profession he proposes to embrace. Yet this sum total lacks a word of challenge upon the most fundamental of all journalistic responsibilities—namely, responsibility to the root and source of all journalistic freedom and stability in the United States, namely, the Constitution. I have always insisted that no man is eligible to the editorship of an American newspaper without an intimate familiarity with American history and an intelligent understanding of the Constitution and its essentialities. I have always insisted that instruction upon these subjects is more vital in a "School of Journalism" than were mechanical instruction in type sizes, etc. In other words, here is the very rock bottom of journalistic responsibilities. Is a "code" complete which ignores a paramount obligation?

I have no pride of opinion in relation to the form which this amendment to the "Canons of Journalism" shall take. My own phraseology is submitted solely to focus specific argument. Within the past year I have submitted my proposal to many members of the American Society. President Yost has approved it. "Yes," is the answer from T. E. Niles, of th New York Evening Mail; E. C. Hopwood, of the Cleveland Plain Dealer; Grove Patterson, of the Toledo Blade; John D. Dun, of the Toledo Times; Marc Rose, of Buffalo, Edgar B. Piper, of the Portland Oregonian; Donald Sterling, of the Portland Journal, and E. S. Beck, of the Chicago Tribune.

Walter M. Harrison, of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman, and Mr. Charles H. Dennis, of the Chicago Daily News, respond in the affirmative, but raise only a possible question regarding advisable phraseology.

David E. Smiley, of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and Mr. Marvin H. Creager, of the Milwaukee Journal, respond in the affirmative, although adding that the idea is probably too obvious to require specific expression. Ralph E. Stout, of the Kansas City Star, expresses open mindedness on the subject but urges that too many concrete things must not enter the code.

Answering the suggestion that constitutional fidelities are "too obvious" to require specification, I want to suggest that the code contains many other "obvious" things. Surely it is obvious that newspapers are "constrained to be truthful." Certainly it is "obvious" that "good faith with the reader" is fundamental. Indeed, I submit that the inclusion of so many "obvious" things in the code makes the exclusion of constitutional fidelities a possible question mark and infers a latitude upon this score which we have no right to concede.

One or two letters from earnest editors have opposed by proposal because of the confusion existing in a definition of what "Constitutional Fidelities" really involve. But I submit that there can be no confusion regarding fundamentals when once written into the Constitution itself.

I beg your indulgence for this long communication. I have wanted to set forth the whole story so that you might better consider the advisability of inspiring a general discussion. I realize that the subject is more or less academic—but no more so than the code itself. My whole point is that if we are to have a code, it should be adequately comprehensive—just as I have already insisted in convention, that if we are to have a code its crass violation should be challenged.

A. H. Vandenberg.

Copy "Ain't What It Used to Be"

To Editor & Publisher:—In a recent issue of Editor & Publisher, Ralph Stout of the Kansas City Star seems to think that the "Intelligent Compositor" ain't what he used to be. Well, for that matter, the copy that comes out to the compositor ain't what it used to be either.

With the development of the multiple magazine composing machine, the printer today has plenty to do without trying to edit the copy as sent out from the city room.

And so far as the proofroom is concerned, its being a home for decrepit printers is admitted, but whose fault is it? I have been a printer for over 20 years, and never, in all that time, have I seen a foreman put an apprentice in the proofroom. Proofreaders are not born. They are made, just the same as an operator, or a bandman, or a make-up.

The typographical union in New York has done its share for the apprentices. They are watched closer than any other tradesmen. The foreman is required to report on his progress. The apprentice must attend school. He is marked on his knowledge and aptitude and should he fall below the set mark, he is kindly invited to go learn bricklaying or something more suitable.

But sometimes he does neither. He goes barnstorming, gets fired here and there, and finally gets his card in a town where union conditions are not strict, and where a suitable examination is not given to ascertain his knowledge and ability.

And so far as men going from the composing room to the city room, the route followed (as Mr. Stout says) by many of the stars of others days is concerned, the break came some 15 years ago, when a great many newspaper editors laid stress on the necessity of their staffs being composed of college men. These men were supposed to bring from their alma maters a knowledge of the King's English, such as was not possessed by the unlettered compositor.

But have they? Just read the news columns of the newspapers and see. With the exception of the dramatic and literary sections, and, of course, the editorial pages, one can find almost any sort of a violation of the rules of grammar.

On metropolitan newspapers the only men coming in close contact with the editorial staff of a daily are the make-ups, and a great many of the make-up editors of today are men who have come up from the composing room. There should be more, both for the benefit of the office and the men. A man who has been a make-up for a number of years is usually, first of all, one of the best printers in the office, and second, he is apt to be one of the most ambitious.

But the writer has worked on papers on which the foreman has intimated that he didn't want his composing room force mixing with the editorial staff; in fact, requesting the make-ups to cease suggesting changes in the typographical make-up of the paper. His theory was that the city room and the composing room should have no personal connection, or in other words, that one was mechanical and merely assimilated what was fed into it by the other. Thanks to the fact that the paper's make-ups paid little or no attention to the request, the newspaper in question was one of the cleanest in point of typography and make-up in the metropolitan field.

One other point keeps the composing room man from advancing to the city room. The wage question looms large in the eyes of the average man, who has worked at his trade for a number of years, although the writer believes that many printers would take the step were the path opened to them. There is hardly an office that doesn't have at least one printer on its staff doing space work of one sort or another.

Even without the printer becoming a writer, closer co-operation could be obtained and a better paper published if the proprietor of a newspaper could be taught that his composing room employes are just as much interested in the success of a sheet as any other department, and take great pride in the fact that they are part and parcel of a newspaper with some standing in the community.

And if he wants to find that out, let him try the suggestion box method.

Printer.

Here Is Our Representative

Complaint was made at the recent meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors that the cost of selling newspaper features was a considerable element in the price of this portion of the newspaper's expense.

The copy service which the Church Advertising Department offers newspapers is loaded with no personal selling expense. This weekly announcement in Editor and Publisher is our only way to reach newspaper advertising managers—and this space is donated by the paper.

Our only desire in life is to see churches make larger use of various forms of helpful publicity. We believe that they can use newspapers largely and that newspapers can show the churches the way this advertising can best be done.

The price for exclusive use of copy averages four dimes a week. We have other copy which is free to all papers.

SUGGEST to one or more of the drug- gists of your town the possibilities of xtra sales by arranging a standard quipment for the medicine cabinet. Many milies would gladly purchase an assort- ıent of medicines and first aid materials the druggist made the suggestion. This an especially opportune time for such move on the druggist's part as at least ıe of the leading firms of manufacturing ruggists is devoting considerable space ı national advertising to this same line. s many retail druggists carry the ad- ertised line, a tie-up would be very ffective.—Paul C. Rankin, Lawrence Kan.) Journal-World.

Have you thought of the possibilities f a Repair Directory? Roof gutters ıd leaders need replacing or patching, hoes need to be re-soled, hats need to be eaned, lawn mowers need to be sharp- ıed, automobiles need parts, rugs need eaning, etc. The White Plains (N. Y.) 'eporter recently was able to secure al- most a page of this sort of advertising, grouped under the heading "Repair Directory." — G. Harris Danzberger, Hartsdale, N. Y.

The merchants on a side street in an Iowa town of 17,000 were not big space users so a cooperative page was sold them under the heading, "Who's Who on North First St."—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

A novel way of stimulating greater interest in a forthcoming sale to be held by a department store, and consequently one of the largest users of space in a Washington (D. C.) paper has been taken by this Washington advertiser. Using a 6 inch 2 column box he announces the forthcoming sale in a small center box, and gives two excellent examples of values at the sale in the upper left and lower right corners of the large box.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

The more daring will take to their screened piazzas and sleeping porches very soon; the others will not wait many weeks longer. With this summer exodus there is always a demand for a new hammock, swing chair, piazza settee or even folding beds. A drive on porch and lawn furniture at this time should be timely, attractive to business houses and profitable. Fred E. Beane, Manchester, (N. H.) Union Leader.

It would make an interesting stunt for the paper to get up a double page "Progress Pages" on which all the paper's regular advertisers would tell about the progress they had made themselves during the past 12 months and on which they would outline some of the progress they expect to make in the coming seasons. Such pages would be appropriate when retail records were being broken or at any other time. Most stores would be glad to take space on such pages and many stores would use this space in addition to their regularly contracted space.—Frank Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

When the regular bowling season ends it would be a good thing for the paper to get some advertising from the bowling alleys in which the alleys would urge all people who like to bowl to come to the alleys and roll duck pins during the spring and summer. Most alleys would see the benefits of such advertising and so would willingly and quickly come in on it.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

After a local robbery, it is not very difficult to secure a nice advertisement from one or more banks on safety deposit vaults. The idea also will appeal to live insurance agents as the new robbery insurance policies are becoming more and more popular.—Donald O. Ross, Washington, Ia.

BUYS FARM PAPER

Oklahoma Publishing Company Acquires Oklahoma Farmer from Capper

The Oklahoma Publishing Company, publisher of the Oklahoma City Oklahoman and Times, morning and afternoon dailies, and the Oklahoma Farmer-Stockman, weekly farm paper, has purchased from Senator Arthur Capper, of Topeka, Kan., the Oklahoma Farmer and will consolidate the latter two publications beginning with the issue of June 10.

John Fields, editor of the Oklahoma Farmer for many years, retires temporarily from the farm paper field. There will be no change in either editorial or advertising personnel of the Farmer-Stockman, according to the announcement.

Carl Williams will continue as editor with Clarence Roberts, C. W. Mullen and Mabel Bates Williams as his associates. Edgar T. Bell will continue as advertising manager, with Jake F. Thomas and Ray K. Glenn as assistants.

Will Use Dailies to Lure Tourists

The Friendly Valley Association will advertise in newspapers of 10 states during the Summer to attract tourists to the St. Croix Valley of Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Merged Dailies Buy Equipment

Following the merger of the Arkansas City (Kan.) Traveler and the Arkansas City News, both dailies, the new paper has ordered a new 16-page rotary press, capable of printing 30,000 papers an hour. Three editions are to be issued, a street edition in the afternoon at 2 o'clock, a home edition at 4 o'clock and an early mail edition for rural subscribers, in the morning. R. C. Howard, of the News, has retired from newspaper work.

Hat Jobbers to Advertise

Millinery Jobbers Association in convention at Chicago last week voted to form a bureau of publicity to begin a campaign to raise the standards and style elements of the millinery industry. Such a campaign would probably include a national advertising program.

TO ABOLISH STRIKE TAX

Typographical Union President Says End of 44-Hour Week Fight Near

Charles P. Howard, president of the International Typographical Union, announced in Indianapolis, May 26, that strike assessments of one per cent on earnings of union members will be discontinued within a month. The tax was levied in the fight to establish the 44-hour week in job printing establishments of the United States and Canada.

The strike, one of the longest in the history of organized labor, began three years ago this month and $17,389,411 has been raised in assessments to conduct it. Of that sum $15,820,140 was expended for strike purposes, according to records of the union.

"We are enabled to discontinue the assessment at this time because the end of the struggle is in sight and because we have a sufficient surplus in funds to meet any contingency," said Mr. Howard. "Only 1055 printers drew strike benefits last month. As a matter of fact, the number of our members unemployed at this time is considerably less than normal. The strike is confined to 39 cities and only two local unions have more than 100 men on strike."

Gross earnings of union printers in recent months have reached a new high mark, according to union officials. The average of gross earnings per month in the last three months, as shown by the 1 per cent strike assessment record, was $12,395,632. In a three-months period of 1921 the printers' earnings average per month $8,756,355.

NEW DAILY STARTS JUNE 3

Mechanical Installation Complete Sioux City (Ia.) Register Reports

SIOUX CITY, IA., May 26.—The first issue of the Sioux City (Ia.) Register will be published Tuesday, June 3, according to an exclusive announcement made to the representative of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER by R. E. Austin, managing editor of the new daily.

F. M. Kasper, president of the board of directors of the Register Publishing Company, has been named business manager.

Four Intertypes have been installed by C. V. Humphrey. Two more Intertypes have been ordered. The press has been installed and is ready for use. All equipment for the various mechanical departments is in place.

The New York Tribune special wire and feature service has been contracted for, as well as the Public Ledger magazine service, the complete NEA service and fiction from the Bell Syndicate. Features furnished by the George Matthew Adams syndicate will also be used.

The newspaper was started by the striking Sioux City newspaper printers.

Ad and News Separation Explained

James T. Williams, editor of the Boston Transcript, explained the complete separation of the news and advertising departments of the daily newspapers, speaking before the annual convention of the National Electric Light Association, at Atlantic City, May 23. The utilities, he said, are sources of news of real interest to the public, but to make this information available the same agencies that place advertising should not be used. Publicity and advertising departments, he explained, should be as separate as "the editorial and advertising departments of a well-ordered newspaper."

Agency Men Inspect Daily's Plant

The organization staff of Paul Block, Inc., of New York, Boston, Chicago and Detroit made a recent visit to the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram Gazette as guests of the publisher, Theodore T. Ellis. The party included 25 officials headed by Mr. Block.

HUNCHES

Managing editors and city editors are always on the lookout for news and feature ideas that can be used locally. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each hunch published under this head. The fact that the hunch is now being worked successfully in your city does not bar it from this department. Address your contributions to the HUNCH EDITOR. When they appear, clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable hunches will not be returned.

HOW have the filling stations in the paper's city boosted the price of corner lots? In most cities where filling stations are found in large numbers the prices of corner lots have gone way up in the last few years. Some comparisons could be made of former prices and present prices and all this would be very interesting to all the city's residents.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

In the Spring floods, much damage was caused to buildings, some of them being utterly destroyed. A reconstruction story of such sections would be an excellent story. Mention could be made of scenes at the time of the flood and contrast could be made of such conditions with those of the present. Pictures of the flood scenes and the reconstruction scenes could be used as illustrations of a special story if one wished to splurge on the idea.—William J. McNulty, St. John, Canada.

Nearly all movie fans like to pick out errors they note in the pictures. One newspaper is now running a column of these daily, giving free movie tickets for the most ludicrous sent in during the week.—Bert A. Teeters, Springfield, Ohio.

Prominent citizens of your city who came from foreign lands and have won a real success furnish material for a live series, now while immigration is in the limelight.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

The Audubon Society declares that crows are not a farm pest and should not be shot; most farmers take a divergent view. Ask wild life enthusiasts and farmers in your community about this—H. G. Rhawn, Clarksburg, (W. Va.) Exponent.

"Where to Spend the Day," is the title of an idea used recently by an San Francisco paper with great success. Substantial prizes were offered for the best suggestion as to where a visitor might best be taken to show them the city. An interesting variety of suggestions were turned in and many of them were printed from day to day. This idea might be used to advantage by any large city paper, or even a smaller paper published in a community where there are enough places of interest to visit that the plan is justified.—Buford O. Brown, Stanford University, Cal.

The proprietor of a magazine book store told the writer recently that most of his business comes from the mechanic or small business man, adding that the big man of affairs does very little reading as a result of his social, club or civic duties. Have a reporter call upon the leading magazine store proprietor in your town for a story on this subject. It would be more interesting than a similar story from the head of the local library if you choose for the interview a man who has been in the business many years and has close personal contact with the customers.—Fred L. W. Bennett, Salt Lake City, Utah.

A good neighbor is a good friend. A column of side lights in various neighborhoods, with a little compliment on some especially good work, well deserved, can build friends and readers for the paper. —C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

With pugilistic titles changing hands, the world's baseball championship series approaching, and interest at high pitch in other branches of athletics, the sport story's the thing these days. While youth is being served, why not turn back the leaves of life's book and give the Old Timers a chance to speak for themselves and the glories of sport in their days. A series of interviews with all the old-time athletes in your town who in their day attained any degree of prominence should make good reading. It might be well to introduce the series with a story on the old, old dispute of whether the athletes and athletics of old were better than the present day crop and the way the games are played today. Then follow the lead each day by having the subject of the daily interview give his opinions—John H. A. Kelly, Norristown, Pa.

N. Y. Times Issues Reading Instructions

"How to Read the New York Times," is the title of a pamphlet issued by the New York Times, giving instructions to readers in methods of obtaining the greatest benefit afforded daily by a perusal of that publication. Six suggestions are laid down: (1) possess the news; (2) read it as a continuous story; (3) use it as a text; (4) consider the significance of news; (5) form your own opinion; (6) check up on your own opinion. The booklet says: "Used in this way, the New York Times will yield you a full return for the time you spend on newspaper reading; it will give you boundless service in the way of education.

TO CONSOLIDATE CHURCH PRESS

Methodists Declare Time Unripe to Establish Daily Newspaper

First steps were taken at the general conference of the Methodist Church in Springfield, Mass., this week to start a Methodist Church newspaper, along the lines of a daily. There is a general wish to have one national church newspaper instead of the various weekly "Christian Advocates" now published.

It was decided at the conference to allow the existing area Christian Advocates to continue as they are, but each Methodist paper will print in future editions from 6 to 10 pages of uniform matter prepared by a contributing editor under the direction of the Book Committee of the Church. This is understood to be a step towards the ultimate consolidation of all the Methodist publications.

The book committee reported the time was not yet ripe to establish the daily.

Hosiery Ad Fight in Court

The Burson Knitting Company, in a petition filed in the United States district court at Detroit, Mich., has asked a court order to restrain the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World and the Detroit Better Business bureau from interfering with the firm's use of the terms "full-fashioned" and "fashioned" in connection with the Burson products. The firm claims the two names have been used two decades in its business although the defendant clubs have ruled against the firm's use of the names. The court will be asked to decide whether or not the Burson products fulfill the definition of the terms.

Model Proofreading Department

The New York Times has provided for its proofreading staff new working quarters that are declared by the officers of the New York Society of Proofreaders to be superior to those of any other newspaper in the country. Unnecessary noise, perhaps the most disturbing element with which the proofreader has to contend, has been effectually eliminated; the room is spacious, light, well ventilated, and in general sanitary excellence is unsurpassable, according to Society officials.

Graduates Receive "Ding's" Cartoon

Each of the 29 members of the graduating class of the Gutherie, Ia., high school were presented with a copy of J. N. (Ding) Darling's Pulitzer prize winning cartoon "In Good Old U. S. A.," by Rev. John F. Arnold who delivered the baccalaureate sermon. Rev. Mr. Arnold declared that this cartoon contained a commencement address in itself and asked each member of the class to frame it and study the message it teaches.

"ON TO BRITAIN" NUMBER OF EDITOR & PUBLISHER

Publication Date June 21 Advertising forms close June 11

This will be the most unusual number ever attempted in the history of international journalism and advertising.

An edition that will broaden the vision of every advertising man and every newspaperman no matter where he is located or what position he occupies.

This number will be the result of untiring co-operation between our local editorial staff, our London editor, Mr. Herbert C. Ridout and our special commissioner, Mr. H. Rea Fitch. Twelve months of painstaking work is back of this feature edition.

Nothing exactly like this "On to Britain" Number has ever been attempted heretofore. It will be a gigantic stride forward towards better understanding as between British and American advertising and publishing interests. Through its columns, American advertisers and agents will secure better understanding of British markets, media and advertising methods. BRITISH ADVERTISING INTERESTS ON THE OTHER HAND EXPECT TO BE JUST AS COMPLETELY INFORMED THROUGH THIS EDITION AS TO AMERICAN MARKETS, MEDIA AND ADVERTISING METHODS.

Tell It to SWEENEY!

—and remember Marya

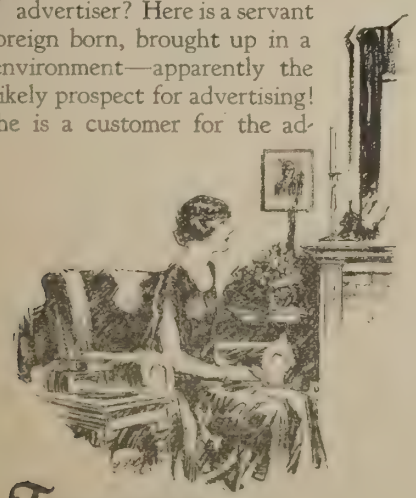
Extract from a letter:

HERE is an incident for your Sweeney series.

We have a new maid, Marya, nineteen years old, brought to this country by illiterate Russian parents when she was five, and reared in squalid poverty on a truck farm near Chicago. Her utter ignorance of how to cook even oatmeal or make toast is almost incredible.

In the course of showing her around, Buddie pointed out our stock of Palmolive, and told her to help herself when she needed toilet soap.

"Ah, no! I buy my own soap," said Marya.



Buddie insisted that there was no necessity for buying her own, that she was welcome to all she wanted of anything we had in the house.

Marya smiled, still superior and unimpressed, and explained, "I never use anything but Woodbury's Facial."

And there, as Vanderlip said to the Senate, you are! Incidentally Marya has four young men who compete for the privilege of driving from forty to sixty miles to take her out in their cars. So it must pay to have The Skin You Love to Touch!

WHAT do you make of this, national advertiser? Here is a servant girl, foreign born, brought up in a bad environment—apparently the least likely prospect for advertising! Yet she is a customer for the advertised article, a customer made by advertising.

Tomorrow

Think a little further,—of Marya tomorrow, matron and probable mother of a family when she accedes to the inevitable and eventually marries one of the automobile-owning chaps who now seek her company. Education—chiefly a capacity for it. Tastes—few, but forming. Convictions—changing. Future—fabulous, when you remember where she started. You may yet meet Marya in your own house, in your own club, among your own friends—advanced pupil of life, time, opportunity, and advertising. Marya already is a proof and a prophecy that it pays to Tell It to Sweeney, the average man, woman and family, the common people!

REMEMBER Marya when you plan your New York advertising appropriation and campaign. Six million people in this greatest American city—six million on the make, with more wealth, more earning power, more unsatisfied ambition, more consumption capacity than any other market in the world.

And remember The News, New York's own kind of newspaper, with the Largest Daily Circulation in America—almost eight hundred thousand copies each weekday; a proven medium that covers more of this mammoth market more thoroughly than any other publication; doing the biggest and best advertising job in New York today, and at the lowest cost. Get the essential facts!

TELL IT TO SWEENEY has been issued in folder form. Write for the series on your business letterhead.

On the Breakfast Tables of Baltimore

Eggs and bacon, a steaming cup of coffee, a copy of the morning SUN—that's the way Baltimore gets off to a good start each day.

With the Baltimorean, THE SUN is regarded as a home necessity. Father and grandfather before him enjoyed reading the morning Sunpaper before leaving for the factory or the office. Sun Carrier Service made that habit well-nigh inherent.

The Sunpapers are preeminently HOME DELIVERED and HOME READ. Morning, Evening and Sunday, 112 Sun Route Owners—responsible business men—with their corps of assistants, serve The Sunpapers into the homes of Baltimore, in many blocks stopping at every doorstep.

Sun Carrier Service guarantees the same circulation to the same people every day. Sun Carrier Service guarantees to the Advertiser the entire family as his audience, not just one reader per paper as in the case of street sales.

For Baltimore, maximum reader interest plus volume of circulation equals THE SUNPAPERS.

Philadelphia Thrift

Addressing the members of the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association the other day, CHARLES S. CALDWELL, President of the Corn Exchange National Bank, stated that Philadelphia now has 860,000 building and loan shareholders. This is the largest number that has ever been cited for this city and it is doubtless not exceeded in any other. It is a marker of the thrift that prevails in most of Philadelphia's households. It tells the story of a habit of saving, also marked by hundreds of thousands of savings accounts, which grows faster than the normal increase in population.

The above editorial from The Philadelphia Bulletin of Saturday, May 24th, throws a side-light on Philadelphia's pre-eminence for any advertising campaign.

Practically every citizen in Philadelphia is ambitious to own his own home; more than half of them do.

Home-owners make the best possible kind of "prospects" for any commodity, and they are the kind of people who usually have the money to pay for things they want.

Dominate Philadelphia

Create maximum impression at one cost by concentrating in the newspaper "nearly everybody" reads—

Nearly 600 Political Writers To Cover Cleveland G. O. P. Convention

Five Hundred Sixty-eight Press Seats Allotted—Elaborate Radio Connections Will Enable 20,000,000 to "Listen In"—100 Telegraphers to "Send"

TWENTY million people in the United States will be able to "listen in" on the National Republican Convention which opens in Cleveland on June 10. That fact alone will mark it as different from any previous convention. No such elaborate plans for broadcasting have ever been attempted as have been worked out by the convention committee on arrangements with Col. Carmi Thompson as chairman and James L. E. Jappe as local convention secretary.

When John T. Adams, retiring national chairman, opens the convention and is followed by Congressman Theodore E. Burton, who will make the keynote speech, they will be heard distinctly by every one of the 13,000 persons gathered in the Public Auditorium and their voices will be perfectly clear to an audience of 100,000 people outside if that many should gather near the building.

A Western Electric loud speaker has been installed at a cost of $12,000 on the west side of the platform with 12 huge horns arranged in a circle directly over the tongue of the platform where the speakers will stand. Several more horns near the ceiling will carry the words of speakers outside of the building. A microphone near the speaker picks up the voice and changes it into electrical energy which is impressed on the in-put of the amplifier that increases it 600,000 times and sends it back to the horns made up of high powered receivers which re-convert the electrical pulsations into sound.

The radio microphone of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company will also connect with the loud speaker and send the speeches out on special telephone wires to broadcasting stations in New York, Schenectady, St. Louis, Washington, Boston, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Buffalo, Chicago, Cleveland and possibly other cities. James B. Preston of the senate press gallery, Washington, is to be official announcer and give out the names of the speakers and explain any applause.

"Wire pictures" will be sent from Cleveland to New York by the new method recently perfected.

Radio broadcasting is only one means by which the proceedings of the convention will reach the people of the country. Space for 586 press desks has been built on the stage with stairs leading down on either side to the press headquarters in the Exhibit Hall in the basement of the Public Auditorium.

Here the Western Union and Postal Telegraph companies have brought in a large number of cables. The Western Union alone has 200 wires in underground cables laid especially for the convention which will connect directly with its main office in the Rose building. One hundred operators will be in attendance, besides the telegraphers of various newspapers who will have their own special leased wires. One automatic, two channel multiplex cable will connect directly with the Pacific Coast. The telephone system looks like a large local exchange.

NEW YORK PREPARES FOR DEMOCRATIC MEET

WHILE Republicans gather at Cleveland, elaborate preparations are being made for reception of press representatives who will come to New York, June 20, for the Democratic National Convention.

Leading among New York newspaper men active in convention arrangements, is Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York World. To that newspaper goes credit for bringing the Democrats to New York.

Workmen are reconstructing Madison Square Garden to make space for nearly 1,000 political correspondents.

Downstairs in the Garden basement, the New York World and Baltimore Sun will jointly operate a restaurant and workrooms for newspaper men.

Charles Hambridge, of the New York Times, former president of the New York Newspaper Club, and representative of the press on the New York Democratic Reception Committee, has appointed committees to arrange for entertainment and service for the visiting news men.

Made up largely of veteran political writers, now retired, these committees know how to furnish service of the right kind for convention reporters. Hambridge has informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER that "service" is the keynote of the committee plans.

Entertainment, nevertheless, will not be neglected. Golf privileges for visiting newspaper men have been obtained by Hambridge at many of the metropolitan golf courses. Banquets and sight-seeing tours will be in order.

Facilities for obtaining theater tickets at box office prices will be arranged at the Newspaper Club.

Assignment of press seats for the convention made by the Standing Committee of Correspondents shows that 350 newspapers, press associations and syndicates will be allotted the 568 seats provided. When it is considered that the big press associations have been allotted 13 seats each and some of the larger papers seats in proportion, it is apparent at once that most of the newspapers represented will have only one seat.

The Standing Committee also has made arrangements with the local committees and the Republican national organization to take care of the photographers and the cartoonists by issuing floor badges, which will entitle them to roving commissions to facilitate their work.

About 70 men will represent the 6 leading press associations, all of which have made elaborate preparations to cover the convention. To write the "woman's angle," all but the Associated Press have obtained the services of women reporters.

Frederick Roy Martin, general manager, Jackson S. Elliott, assistant general manager, and Milton Garges, chief of traffic, are the Associated Press executives who will be on hand from the New York headquarters. This year will be the first in which Elliott has not done a part of the news writing since 1896, when he attended his first political convention as a newspaper man.

L. C. Probert, superintendent of the Washington bureau of the Associated Press, will be in charge of the A. P. political staff, which comprises the following writers: J. L. West, E. R. Bartly, P. F. Haupert, Kirk L. Simpson, S. T. Early, John T. Suter, Byron Price, C. B. Jones, C. S. Brandebury and J. H. Reitinger.

This corps of writers will be assisted by men from the Central Division of the Associated Press, who will be in charge of E. T. Cutter, Central Division superintendent. They are: R. J. Dustman, of the Columbus bureau; L. J. Sullivan, Chicago bureau, and J. W. McGuire, Cleveland bureau.

Joseph J. Jones, cashier of the Chicago bureau of the Associated Press, will have charge of all business and financial arrangements for the A. P. delegation. This year will be the 20th that he has served in this capacity.

M. Koenigsburg, president of International News Service, and George C. Shor, editor and manager, will attend the convention for I. N. S., which service will be represented by the following special writers:

United States Senator Medill McCormick, Republican, of Illinois, who is a noted writer as well as a prominent figure in American politics; O. O. McIntyre, magazine writer; Helen Rowland, author of the "Sayings of Mrs. Solomon" and "Meditations of a Wife"; Jack Lait, playwright and short story writer; Martin H. Glynn, former Governor of New York, prominent Democrat, and editor and publisher of the Albany Times-Union, recently purchased by William Randolph Hearst; and Ray Long, editor of Cosmopolitan Magazine.

Regular I. N. S. writers will be under the supervision of E. Barry Farris, associate editor, I. N. S. They are: George R. Holmes, Washington manager and chief Washington correspondent; William K. Hutchinson, Kenneth Clark, A. O. Hayward, George E. Durno, Roland Krebs, Albert Baenziger, David M. Church, Eddie Mahoney, Sherman Duffy, Arthur Struwe, Bill Brons, Connie McElreath and R. Borst.

Fred Ferguson, vice-president in charge of news of the United Press Associations, will direct the U. P. staff at the convention. Robert J. Bender, political writer, will handle the lead stories and will be assisted by Frazer Edwards, Paul Mallon, Milton MacKaye, Frank Getty, and Dorothy Shumate.

Raymond Clapper will write the lead stories for United News. His assistants will be Ralph Turner and Maxine Davis. Senator Arthur Capper will write special articles on the convention for United News.

William F. Lynch, traffic superintendent of the United Press, will be in charge of the U. P. and U. N. wire services.

Chester Hope, editor of Universal Service, who will be at the convention, has announced the following staff: Arthur Brisbane, Norman Hapgood, Edwin J. Clapp, Damon Runyon, Bugs Baer, Kenneth C. Beaton, George W. Hinman, John T. Lambert, James R. Nourse, Early Shaub, Winifred Van Duzer, and Wiley S. Smith.

David Lawrence and Robert T. Small will represent Consolidated News Service.

For the convenience of the motion picture photographers who wish to rush their pictures an aeroplane landing field has been made ready opposite the Auditorium on the lake front.

The presence of more than 400 women delegates and alternates brings a new note into the convention. They will be taken care of by the Woman's Committee of the National Republican Committee with Mrs. Nettie M. Clapp, state representative, as chairman. Five general hostesses for hotels, golf, club, social and motor activities have been appointed with a large number of women serving under them. There will be several hostesses in attendance at each hotel at all times and hundreds of motor cars will be at the disposal of the guests.

Among the entertainments which have been planned are a golf tournament for women, a reception and musicale at the Shaker Heights Golf Club, a tea at the Woman's Club, motor trips about the city and a lake ride on Wednesday afternoon for both men and women, with elaborate fireworks on the lake front in the evening.

All newspaper women and wives of correspondents will be given credential cards that they may enjoy all entertainments provided.

At the Women's Republican Club headquarters in the Hollenden Hotel and the Women's Coolidge headquarters at the Cleveland, tea will be served every afternoon, thus lending a social side to the meeting of committees.

The press committee, of which George F. Moran, business manager of the Cleveland News, is chairman, has arranged for a men's golf tournament on Friday morning at the Country Club under the auspices of the Washington Press Club, as well as a midnight theatre party Tuesday at the Prospect Theatre.

The civic spirit of the citizens of Cleveland has been aroused and nothing for the comfort and entertainment of their guests has been neglected. If the business of nominating Calvin Coldge for President bids fair to be a bit cut and dried, the sideshows will add color and the delegates, visitors and press representatives will find the city in gala dress. Thousands of dollars have been spent within the last few months, planting trees and shrubs, cleaning up waste places and landscaping them, re-sodding the public square. The city dump on the Mall has been reclaimed and made into a parking area for automobiles.

CANADIAN PRESS HOLDS ANNUAL MEET

Loss of Government Grant Has Not Affected Service President Smith Reports — $9,054 Surplus Over Expenditures

Vancouver, June 5.—Members of the Canadian Press from all sections of Canada attended the annual meeting of that organization in this city on June 4. Proceedings were more or less of a routine character, as no new business of importance was introduced.

E. Norman Smith

In his presidential address, E. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal, reviewed briefly the developments of the year. The organization had passed through the greatest crisis in its history successfully he said, and not only would continue as a national body but was never as strong nationally before as it was today.

Mr. Smith reviewed those happenings at the 1923 session of Parliament, which led to the cancellation of the annual grants of $50,000 for the leased wires across the 3 sparsely settled gaps in the Dominion and $8,000 towards the supplementary cable service from Britain.

However, he said, the several divisions had approved of methods recommended by the directors for absorbing the $58,000 and the leased wires and British cable service would be retained.

"And last, but not least," concluded Mr. Smith, "that great co-operative organization, the Associated Press of the United States, whose methods and ideals we have copied and followed, has defined in a new long-term contract that the basis of the relationship between our two organizations is the national co-operative character of each and made it clear that it will not be a party to anything that detracts from the present continent-wide scope of the Canadian Press."

In the news report of the management, J. F. B. Livesay, general manager, paid a tribute to the loyalty and zeal of the staff.

Reporting on cable service, Mr. Livesay stated that there had been a systematic cutting down of wordage in preparation for the loss of the government grant on April 1. In the meantime last October an agreement had been made with Sir Roderick Jones that the Canadian Press fee to Reuters be increased from £60 a month to £1,000 a year, offset by an increase from $100 to $200 a month in the fee Reuters paid the Canadian Press for filing on their behalf service from Vancouver to the Australian Press Association. This arrangement, however, was temporary and would be revised next month in London.

The financial report showed that up to August 31, 1923, operations had resulted in an accumulated surplus of $8,480.02. For the 7 months ended March 31, 1924, after which the new system of costs became effective, there was a balance of $574.47, making total surplus of $9,054.49. All 3 circuit costs showed surpluses and cable service had at March 31 surplus of $2,199.95.

Intertype Declares Dividends

At a meeting of the Intertype Board of Directors held May 20, the following dividends were declared: Regular quarterly dividend of $2.00 per share on First Preferred Stock, payable July 1, 1924, to stockholders of record at close of business June 16, 1924. Regular semi-annual dividend of $3.00 per share on Second Preferred Stock, payable July 1st, 1924, to stockholders of record at close of business June 16, 1924.

RADIO FUTURE WITH PRESS, I. C. M. A. HEARS

Weir of Syracuse New President, Hatton of Detroit, Vice-President—Next Meeting at Colorado Springs —Schmid Tells Louisville Convention What Rural Circulation Costs.

By R. R. MAXWELL

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

LOUISVILLE, Ky., June 5.—Robert Weir, of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Journal was unanimously elected president of International Circulation Managers' Association, to succeed M. W. Florer of the Dallas News, at the close of the 20th annual convention held at the Brown Hotel here this afternoon. E. R. Hatton, Detroit Free Press, was elected first vice-president; Charles Payne, Indianapolis Star, was elected second vice-president and Clarence Eyster, Peoria (Ill.) Star, was re-elected secretary by acclamation.

R. S. WEIR

Three directors elected for a term of three years were H. W. Stodghill, Louisville Courier Journal & Times; Lattier Snyder, Baltimore News, and Wylie Baker, Knoxville Sentinel.

After a lively contest in which representatives of more than twelve cities took part, Colorado Springs was chosen as the meeting place for 1925. The convention, which was the largest ever held in the history of the Association, opened Tuesday morning with more than 300 delegates in attendance. President Florer delivered his annual address in which he pointed out the rapid growth of the organization and the things it has accomplished.

"I feel that the past year has been one of the best in our history, based upon the tenets of our Association, that of mutual enlightment, reciprocity and co-operation," he said. "I believe that more problems have been solved or are in the process of solution than ever before in our history.

"Publishers seem to understand more and more the great values to them of membership of their circulation managers and look upon attendance at our annual conventions as an investment which pays dividends in increased efficiency and wider knowledge of the circulation management."

Sidney D. Long, Wichita Eagle, responded to the address of welcome to the delegates delivered by Mayor Huston Quin who said that without circulation the newspaper cannot exist, and therefore it is the circulation men who are responsible for the uplifting and educational work of the press. Mr. Long outlined the delightful reception accorded the association meeting held in Louisville 18 years ago and thanked the mayor for the expression of welcome. Minutes of the previous convention were followed by reports of the board of directors, secretary and auditor, and reports of the various committees.

CLARENCE EYSTER

Speakers on the morning's program were Charles O. Reville, Baltimore Sun, who talked on "A Rotogravure Supplement—Is it Worth the Production Cost as a Circulation Builder"?; Max Halmbacher, Oklahoma City Oklahoman-Times, on "The Return Privilege to Railway News Companies—Does it Bring Increased Representation? Is it Abused? Advantages and Disadvantages"; James L. Farley, Philadelphia North American, on "Are Premiums Being Used More Generally"? and Alonzo L. Parker, Los Angeles Times, on "Is the Expense of Creating Home Delivery Among Tourists Justifiable"?

The afternoon session was given over to the following addresses: W. L. Argue, Toronto Star, on "Which Is More Important, News or Features: Is the Tendency Drifting Towards One or the Other"?; Stanley Clague, managing director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, Chicago, and Credo Harris of WHAS radio station, the Courier Journal, Louisville.

"I believe that the position of circulation manager is today a position of greater power than it has ever been," said Mr. Clague. "Day by day that power and influence will increase. I hope that the A. B. C. has had some part in this and I hope the further advancement of newspaper owners appreciation of your work, you will allow the A. B. C. to continue to be of service to you.

"The growing power of the circulation manager is, however, carrying with it a growing responsibility not only to his publisher and those associated with him, but to the public and the nation.

"I am not here to decry legitimate promation enterprises in the publishing business. I do not think, however, that there will be any serious dissension from my viewpoint that schemes and so-called clever ideas that come just within the law which temporarily inflate circulation are a menace rather than a contribution to the building of a newspaper property."

Credo Harris predicted the day will come when light, heat and power will be sent by no other means than radio in his address on "The Future of Radio."

"I doubt if we shall see many wires thirty-five or forty years from now except in smaller towns. Trunk telephone and telegraph systems will probably be radioized and large cities will be using radio for telephone service. Profound scientists are already gazing into the day when a million radio telephones, foolproof and automatic, will be vitalized by a central station and operated without switchboards, without wires without a chance of going wrong.

H. W. STODGHILL

"Into whose hands, then should this public service of radio casting be intrusted? Of course, the newspapers'. The logical gatherers of news and entertainment should be disseminators, both in print and the spoken word. Just at present this does not seem to be working out, since there are more stations operated by manufacturers, but remember that this is still the period of outside expansion, with the golden harvest of selling every Tom, Dick and Harry the good or bad, or both. When this has settled down, and Tom has grown in radio intelligence with the growth of thoroughly perfected radio apparatus, there will be a decreasing reason for manufacturers, and increasing reason for newspapers, to speak directly into the homes of their respective clients.

The second annual masquerade dance of the association was held Tuesday night with Jules Brazil of Toronto official fun maker of the convention, as master of ceremonies. A shopping tour through the retail district was arranged for the ladies of the convention Tuesday morning and a bridge and Mah Johng party was held by them in the afternoon at Fontaine Ferry Park.

Sessions on Wednesday were held on the steamer America, on the Ohio river. The delegates arrived at Rose Island at noon where they were the guests of D. G. B. Rose of the Standard Printing Company. They were served with a chicken dinner and remained on the island three hours.

Speakers at the morning session on the trip up the river, were E. C. White, Houston Chronicle, on "Should the A. B. C. make deductions on dealer circulation when a newspaper shows a heavy percentage of unpaid accounts? If so, at what figure should the deduction commence?" and J. C. Montgomery, Detroit News, on "In radio, does the newspaper which operates a broadcaster have any advantage over a newspaper which does not operate a set, but does carry daily programs or weekly radio section?" Other speakers were J. O. Stuardi, Mobile Register, on "A practical system of weekly collections from country dealers, who collect monthly from their customers. How to bring it about"; J. F. Sweeney, Winnipeg Free Press, on "A plan that insures 100 per cent collections from carriers"; Royal Weiler, Allentown Call, on "Queer circulation stunts I have encountered," and A. G. Lincoln, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, on "The value of advertising for circulation by use of billboards and novelties. Can a newspaper remain consistent and do it?"

WYLIE BAKER

A. C. Pearson, president of the Economist Group, New York, reviewed the postal situation for the circulation men. He traced the history of second-class postage, telling why the Government took upon itself the task of distributing the mails and why Congress had seen fit to grant special rate privileges to the press.

He then pointed out that muck-raking magazines and newspapers had antagonized Congress, that the One Cent Postage League had fought incessantly the rates accorded newspapers and magazines, and that the increasing volume of advertising had paved the way for propaganda that the second-class rate was a subsidy given to the press, which had departed from its function of education and had become largely a carrier of advertising. This propaganda, aided by the hatred for newspapers of former Postmaster General Burleson and Representative Kitchin, made easy the enactment of the zone law and rate increases of the war and later years.

The one-cent flat rate, Mr. Pearson said, had made possible the best and cheapest newspapers and periodicals in the world and made the United States the leader in the use of advertising. National distribution of publications brought about by the old postal system had reduced sectionalism to a minimum in the United States and removed the bar to national development which has always afflicted other countries of large territory —China and Russia, for instance—which have never been nations because there is no national thought.

WARLEE

(Will the Craft pardon the intrusion of this reference to my summer home on the Severn . . . considering that it includes an invitation to drop in if you are ever near there? H. E. W.)

There is no place beneath the sun
So restful as the only one
That soothes my troubled spirits, when
I leave the haunts of fretful men.
There is no calm retreat that holds
Its blues, its crimsons and its golds,
Its hues and fragrances, so rare
That gods seem brewing nectars there.

It sets within a wooded frame
Hard by a stream with fish as game
As ever struck the lure, at play
On tides of any fishing day.
And should I weary of the line,
There is the wood of tree and vine—
Spring's ray-shot carpet spread for me
With violet and anemone.

No diva ever sang such notes
As burst from myriad swelling throats
Of nature's songsters, flittering high
Or crossing an untroubled sky.
No miser's heap of gold could pay
For that free concert every day;
No bribe could buy one homely hue
That streaks my treasured garden through.

And when my time has come, when Fate
Calls me to that half-opened Gate—
When human voices fade, and seem
To linger only in a dream,
Let them who watch me raise the shade
So that, unflinching, unafraid,
My parting gaze may meet the skies
That smile on Warlee's paradise.

LACK OF HOME DELIVERY IN NEW YORK MAKES A UNIQUE SITUATION

By PAUL O. SERGENT
Louisville Herald & Post

The general differences in the organization and operation of a circulation department in a city of one hundred thousand, and one million or over.
Paul O. Sergent.

DUE to the fact that this topic has been worded so as to include any or all cities of 1,000,000 or over, I am taking the liberty of comparing the average city of 100,000 and New York City, for the reason that any comparison which places all of these large cities into one group would be impracticable and misleading. While Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, Baltimore, St. Louis, each have a population of a million or at least close to that figure, each have their own peculiar systems.

PAUL O. SERGENT

For instance, the Philadlephia joint morning delivery system through which all of the morning newspapers make their delivery, dealing with the adult carriers operating in well defined boundaries would be a story in itself, and has no counterpart in New York.

Nor has the afternoon system of substations and newsboy carrier delivery as exists in Philadelphia, Detroit, Baltimore, and other large cities bordering on a million population, anything in common with the New York method.

The outstanding difference between the whole circulation structure in New York and the average city of one hundred thousand is the fact that in New York there is no home delivery, or any semblance of it, maintained or fostered by any New York newspaper, morning or evening, while the home delivered carrier circulation usually forms the backbone of the city circulation of the average city of 100,000. The carrier circulation in the smaller cities will oftentimes amount to 80 or 90 per cent of the city circulation.

It is true that a small percentage of New York morning newspapers are delivered to the door of the subscriber, but this figure is inconsequential and such delivery is handled in a roundabout method through a corner newsstand which makes a more or less haphazard delivery through the apartment elevator operator or building superintendent. If the subscriber is lucky he may enjoy a fairly good delivery, but more often than not, he will either recieve no paper or the regular paper which he has ordered will be substituted by another. Due to mistakes in handling, the service is so generally unsatisfactory that he ultimately gives it up and reverts to his old habit of buying from one of the newsstands.

Now and then some effort has been made to build up a carrier delivery on the New York morning newspapers but such effort has usually been short-lived or spasmodic. The plan, however, in the opinion of many experienced and able circulation managers has never been carried along for sufficient duration to give it a fair trial. Obviously this opinion refers to the residential sections of New York, where direct contact with the subscriber may be established and does not include Manhattan where 97½ per cent of the population dwell in rented flats and apartments. The 2½ home ownership in Manhattan would not encourage the idea of carrier delivery.

A large part of the newspaper circulation in greater New York is sold from day to day off the newsstands of which there are approximately 7,000. A large number of these newsdealers refuse to make any delivery whatever to subscribers and in fact, I have come in personal contact with a number of such dealers who found in attempting to sell their places of business that a newspaper route in connection with it was looked upon as a liability.

When I say that the chief difference is due to the fact that we have no home delivery in New York, you may not quite sense the full significance of this statement, unless you analyze all of the circulation promotion work, which you are now doing in the smaller cities where you employ a home delivery. I believe you will find that 90 per cent of all your work, on city circulation only, is tied up directly in one way or another with business which is actually delivered to the subscriber through some form of carrier system. It may be a joint morning delivery or an exclusive morning carrier system; it may be afternoon independent carriers or regular carriers or office owned routes, but you will find that the major part of your work along this direction is based on the idea that you may accept the subscription and make delivery.

Run over in your mind the work which you have done in the past year, such as doll, roller skate, bicycle, automobile, puzzle picture and all other sorts of contests, the work of your city solicitors, the work done through you sub-station managers, carrier boys, advertising new features in the columns of your newspaper and all of the promotion work which you have been doing, and I believe you will find that the greater part of your energy and money has been spent to increase that part of your circulation which is in the hands of your carrier system, whatever it may be.

In other words, you work is centered on that type of business which will stay put. In New York 7,000 dealers for the most part handle the Times, Herald Tribune, World, American, News, Telegraph, Sun, Telegram, Journal, Evening World and Post, not to mention a large number of financial and foreign language newspapers, which means that it is practically impossible to secure any particular help from the dealers. Their profit is the same on one paper as another and quite naturally they show a spirit of utter indifference towards any one newspaper.

This condition is in some respects an advantage for the smaller newspapers, in that they have practically the same opportunity for display as the larger papers, although, of course, the delivery costs are proportionately greater for the small papers because of their small volume of business which must carry the load on a many edition distribution.

There are comparatively few newsboys in New York selling between corners or roaming about the streets. I mention this to show that there is little effort made by any of the newspapers to secure exclusive street hustlers to push their particular paper. This has, of course, been done in the past but has been largely discontinued in the interest of harmony and to avoid antagonizing the regular news dealer to whom the newspapers must look for their sale 365 days a year.

While each of the New York newspapers has its own particular method of promoting circulation, it seems fair to classify the entire policy by saying that the paper must be sold to the public through general publicity and advertising the strong features of the paper through newspaper space, newsstands, elevated and subway station placards, display cards, car cards, truck signs, direct by mail and all of that sort of thing.

Because of the fixed limitations before the circulation managers in their work in New York they are forced to pay more attention to other phases of the work than is given in smaller cities. I refer particularly to the efforts made in covering all special events, such as the World Series, the big prize fights and many other events of importance. For instance, when Lieuts. McCready and Kelly were preparing to make their nonstop flight from New York to San Diego and later when Lieutenant Maughan attempted his transcontinental flight, every morning newspaper exerted a great deal of effort to get a copy of their newspaper in the first transcontinental flight, sending their own men to Mitchel Field each morning before daybreak for several weeks before the flight actually took place. Whether or not such effort is worth while from a publicity standpoint is debatable.

With the Democratic National Convention opening in New York within a few days, the New York circulation managers are, undoubtedly, bending every effort to devise ways and means of getting a good break on this unusual event.

Because of the fact that New York city circulation must be built and maintained almost entirely by the selection of and proper promotion of the features in the newspaper itself, the New York publishers pay tremendous prices for exclusive rights to circulation-producing features, or at least features which seem to have such possibilities. The sum paid by one New York newspaper for the exclusive rights on Major Archie Butts' Roosevelt letters plus the amount spent for one week's newspaper advertising would make rather an attractive budget for promotion work for an entire year on the average newspaper in a city of 100,000. To announce a new Sunday tabloid radio section one newspaper spent nearly $100,000 in newspaper advertising, receiving a net increase of about 50,000 Sunday circulation.

The general plan and method of handling the country circulation is very much the same as in the small cities, although by virtue of the fact that the New York newspapers and particularly the morning newspapers, cover a much larger territory than the average newspaper in the smaller cities, it is obvious that it requires a considerable larger organization and a great deal more work to handle the outside agents. The competition is extremely acute, not only with New York newspapers, but at the distant points where excellent local newspapers are covering the field. Those who have been engaged in circulation work in New York and other Eastern cities have found that it is difficult to secure the same type of agent in outside territory as may usually be secured in other parts of the country.

Carrying and selling of newspapers seems to be frowned upon by the better class of boys, which quite naturally magnifies the problems of distribution and collection. With the exception of one or two New York newspapers, the mail subscription business is comparatively small. I am told that in times past considerable effort has been exerted in building R. F. D. business with little success, and has, therefore, been largely abandoned. It seems that this class of business can better be handled by the good daily newspapers, which are published in the immediate territory.

While it is the consensus of opinion among all newspapermen that the chief essential for constructive circulation building whether in New York or in Eskota, Tex., is in the paper itself, this is true to a greater degree in New York than any other place in the country due to the fact that the buyer walks up to the newsstand and makes his own selection uninfluenced.

In the smaller cities there are numerous instances where the circulation of newspapers of mediocre character is maintained and even increased by a well managed circulation department. Due to the particular New York conditions such circulation achievement would not be possible. For proof of this statement one must only look at the New York newspaper graveyard of the past two years

"HOW ABOUT RADIO BROADCASTING?"

By J. C. MONTGOMERY
Detroit News

"In Radio, Does the Newspaper Which Operates a Broadcaster Have Any Advantage Over a Newspaper Which Does Not Operate a Set But Does Carry Daily Programs Or a Weekly Radio Section?"

A NEWSPAPER operating a broadcasting station has an advantage over a newspaper which does not operate a broadcasting station, although it may publish a radio program.

First, a paper is kept in touch with latest radio developments through its station. This may seem peculiar, but when broadcasting, the paper must have competent radio engineers. These engineers keep the radio editor informed. They can detect hokum in various radio articles put on the market. The radio operator will always find his engineers an asset when putting out a radio section. It happens today that there are few editorial men in the country who can discuss technical radio subjects intelligently and accurately.

A broadcasting station serves as a medium through which the paper is placed at the head of all other papers when any subject pertaining to radio is brought up. The public seems to feel that with its constant attention to broadcasting a natural surety value will be the result in its radio news columns.

In order to discuss the subject thoroughly the good-will angle must not be overlooked, as a broadcasting station is undoubtedly a good-will getter, providing the station furnishes good entertainment. It constantly brings before all classes of people the name of the paper and an idea of the length to which the paper will go to serve not only its clientele but the general public.

There is such a demand for radio programs in the news columns that no paper can well afford to neglect this feature. Extreme care should be taken to present these programs accurately. Here again the paper operating a broadcasting station has the advantage.

During the past month I have come in contact with two papers in large cities which have added tabloid radio sections, one of which maintains a station while the other does not. It is interesting to note that the paper maintaining a broadcasting station shows an increase in circulation while the circulation of the other paper was not affected by the addition of the section.

Any newspaper planning to add a special radio section should stop to consider that it may prove quite embarassing to drop it should the results prove unsatisfactory. Under ordinary conditions a feature may be dropped without undue criticism from its readers, while the dropping of a section causes the reader to think he is being cheated out of something to which he is entitled.

MUCH TO CONDEMN, NOTHING TO PRAISE IN RETURNS FOR R. R. NEWS AGENTS

By M. W. HALMBACHER
Oklahoma City Daily Oklahoman

The return privilege to railway news companies. Does it mean increased representation? Is it abused? Advantages and disadvantages.

THE return privilege to most papers is a relic of past wastes. It is not good business to allow the return privilege to railway news companies.

On first thought, it might seem that the return privilege to railway news companies would have a tendency to increase sales. This, however, would prove to be only a temporary increase in numbers of papers sent to the railway news agent. In many cases he goes through his train and picks up papers already sold, refolds them and resells them as many as three or four times during the day. At the end of the day, this same paper might be checked in as unsold.

If the return privilege were allowed, sales would not be as vigorously pushed as on the non-returnable basis. In most cases the policy of the railway news companies is to take care of demands of the traveling public. Create a demand for your paper. It will be hard, then, for the news agent to offer a substitute.

The return privilege not only cuts down circulation but decreases the circulation revenue.

The return privilege has a tendency to promote dishonesty among news agents.

If railway news companies are shown that there is a demand and no papers to supply the demand, in most cases they will co-operate.

ROTO NO SURROGATE FOR EDITORIAL MERIT, BUT HELPS A GOOD PAPER

By CHARLES O. REVILLE
Baltimore Sun

A rotogravure supplement. Is it worth the production cost as a circulation builder?

IT has been my experience that the results warrant the cost and I can only illustrate this by telling of our experiences and by quoting circulation figures.

C. O. Reville

The Sunday Sun was started during October, 1901, as a straight featureless newspaper. Very few metropolitan features were added until 1910. A comic section was added about 1912.

The rotogravure section made its first Baltimore appearance in the Sunday Sun about seven years ago. Until then the Sunday Sun had been selling at 3 cents. We wished to increase the price to 5 cents, which we did just one week after we added the rotogravure section, it obviously being our idea to offset circulation loss by this added feature. We showed a drop of 3,000 the first Sunday after the price increase, but three weeks later, we were only 100 copies behind the last Sunday at the 3-cent price.

In April, 1920, we increased the price out-of-town to 8 cents with about the same result.

The other Baltimore Sunday morning paper did not increase its price until some time after we did but finally went to five cents without the rotogravure. This was added later, but had no apparent effect on its circulation and was finally dropped, I understand because of its great cost. For January, 1917, our net paid circulation averaged 96,859. For the month of April this year, it averaged 178,585, which was 81,726 copies ahead of the net paid average for January, 1917. We, of course, do not attribute this big increase wholly to rotogravure.

We now publish as many as 16 pages in this section and the revenue from advertising is very good, yet it still costs us money. I understand that there is now only one paper in this country making money on the rotogravure and that it has only been doing so for a short time.

We do not feature our rotogravure by placing it on the outside as some papers do their feature sections, although some out-of-town dealers do place this section on the outside after they receive their supply. The first page of the news section goes outside on all copies of the Sunday Sun just the same as it does on the Morning Sun and the Evening Sun.

We have always followed the plan of selling the Sunpapers as newspapers and not as feature sheets, making them editorially the best we know how, and it is my opinion that if any member of this Association plans to add the rotogravure with the idea that it will offset some editorial weakness, he will be wasting money. On the other hand if he now has a good paper editorially, I believe the addition of the rotogravure will add circulation for him just as it has for us, but his publisher should consider that it must be published at a loss for a good many years and it may never pay its way in advertising revenue.

CHANGING TO INDEPENDENT CARRIERS

By W. H. COONRADT
Decatur (Ill.) Review

IN changing from office-owned to independent carriers it is very important that each carrier as well as all his subscribers thoroughly understand the new arrangement. In our particular case we transferred five routes each week. The carriers in groups of five came to the mail room and were instructed as to the manner in which they were to collect, keep their accounts, receipts and statements shown—in fact each group was given a thorough instruction regarding the new system.

The following Saturday each one of these five boys was accompanied by one of our district managers, who showed him how to collect, instructed him in keeping accounts and also explained fully to each one of the carrier's subscribers the new method of handling the accounts. Careful attention was given to those subscribers paying six months, quarterly, and ten weeks or at the office, letting them know that they could continue to pay in the same way and the carriers would be given proper credit. In case a subscriber pays in advance to a collector or at the office credit is given the carrier each week the same as if he had collected in that way. Each carrier was started with a "clean slate," that is we collected all balances up to the time each carrier was transferred to the independent system so subscribers owed just one week. Our quarterly paying list is checked each month with the carrier.

Each carrier must have a substitute who knows his route, also keeps a route-book up to date to be used in emergencies. Carriers put receipts in their collecting books after the first up to date receipt book was given him when transferred, all receipts being printed one year in advance, one to be torn off each week. After careful investigation it was decided that this was more satisfactory than the punched card, mainly because each boy would have a ledger in his collecting book of each subscriber's account. Special envelopes were also furnished each subscriber to tack up near the collecting door to hold each week's small receipt. Carriers must pay their accounts weekly at the office. If the route does not grow under normal conditions, it is cut. Two boys in the same field will make their territory grow, without additional expense to the company.

To sum up:

Before transferring to the Independent system:—

1. Thoroughly instruct each carrier.
2. Explain new method to each subscriber.
3. Have a school of instruction for all in the department.

After transferring:—

1. Advertise the new method, either in your paper or "booster circulars" to be given out with samples to all non-subscribers on each route.
2. Be prepared to help new carriers or those not making money, show them how to collect and give service.
3. Do not raise or cut a draw unless given a written order by the carrier. This will save any argument when statement is given.

SHOULD UNPAID DEALER ACCOUNTS BE DEDUCTED FROM A. B. C. NET TOTAL

By E. C. WHITE
Houston Chronicle

"Should the A. B. C. Make Deductions on Dealer Circulation When a Newspaper Shows a Heavy Percentage of Unpaid Accounts? If So, At What Figure Should the Deduction Commence?"

IF a newspaper shows a large percentage of unpaid dealer accounts, the auditor should determine whether or not the papers have been paid for by the readers; if the dealer was paid and had failed to pay his obligation to the newspaper, then such papers should not be deducted from the paid circulation, for that is paid circulation, as much as any circulation can be paid.

E. C. White

But, if the dealer has failed to pay for the papers because he has not sold them, or because a lot of papers he had no sale for had been forced on him by the newspaper, or if a big percentage of his papers were left unsold day after day, then a deduction should be made in proportion to the percentage of papers unsold.

For the A. B. C. auditor to make such an investigation of a large number of dealers' accounts, especially country dealers, would necessarily be quite expensive and take considerable time, but as the expense of audits over a certain amount is paid for by the newspaper, it is only fair that such investigation be made before any deductions should be imposed.

Now, it is difficult to set any figure at which investigation of such circulation should be made by the auditor. Unpaid dealers' accounts, or the lack of them, would not always be a safe indication of the condition of the dealer circulation. Books might show dealer accounts paid in full and yet investigation develop the fact that dealers were not selling nearly all the papers furnished them by the publisher. The books might show that a paper's loss on dealer collections was heavy, yet the investigation might show that the papers were paid for by the subscribers and the poor collections due to slackness in the circulation department.

Some newspapers pay dealers a salary or make them an allowance which is supposed to be for some special service, when in reality it is intended to cover the dealer's loss on unsold copies. Some papers pay street boys a salary in addition to giving them a profit on sales. Sometimes, this is to keep representation on a poor corner where the sales are not great enough to hold a boy's interest and sometimes the salary is to make up to the boy for papers he draws and does not sell—so it seems to me that the auditors must keep on the lookout for indications of padding (and that is what it amounts to). I believe it is the custom of the A. B. C. auditors to handle such conditions in this manner.

INDEPENDENT MEN CARRIERS BEST, SAYS SMALL-TOWN CIRCULATOR

By O. McPEAK
Monroe (La.) News-Star

In cities of 20,000 or under, should carriers be independent or salaried and which method will return greatest net revenue?

THIS question is one, which circulation men have been debating for years, with the result that the fellow who is using any system successfully sticks to it as long as he gets the proper results. Conditions vary and the circulator must be able to adapt himself to the different conditions as he finds them.

My experience in circulation work has been mainly in the smaller cities and my opinion is that the independent carrier system will get more circulation than the salaried office owned carrier routes. Your salaried carrier as a rule is paid so much a week for delivery in a certain territory. Whether his number of papers increase or decrease he gets the same amount of money. That being the case, he is not going to tear his hair, or do very much arguing with a patron if he threatens to quit. He will at times go so far as to give bad service to a family who is somewhat off the regular route, necessitating a few extra steps and a little extra time to deliver, hoping that he will thereby get rid of a bad customer.

The salaried boy 10 to 16 years old has no special incentive to build his route. Put this boy on an independent basis and his views are altogether changed. He realizes that prompt and proper delivery service and politeness and courtesy will help him hold the customers he already has. Knowing that each new subscriber he adds means so many cents more each week in his pocket, he watches the new house going up in his territory or the vacant one, and as soon as it is ocupied he's there on the job.

Yet he still is a boy despite his enthusiasm. He cannot approach a prospective customer with the ease or bearing of a man. When complaints are made he can not smooth them over and get the customer satisfied as a man of mature years might do. So instead of the boy why not use a man?

I have used men carriers on independent routes successfully for several years. I divided the city into sections, putting a man in charge of each, making the division so as to give each man from 500 to 700 papers. These paper are sold to him at wholesale. He is placed under contract to make proper delivery, canvass his territory and pay his bill in full each week. In this way the smaller circulation manager who has very little office help, is relieved of much routine work with a small army of boys. As the men do their own canvassing, the circulation account is relieved of expense of city solicitors.

In one instance, where I took charge of a small city circulation, the paper had been operating on a salaried carrier basis and percentage on collections. At that time is was realizing approximately 6½ cents per subscriber per week above carrier and collection expense, which I raised to 11 cents under the independent man carrier system.

Coming to Monroe this year I changed from salaried to independent carriers. At the same time I raised the rate and also put both mail and city on a strictly paid-in-advance basis. It is working beautifully so far and increasing satisfactorily for the short time it has been in operation.

BEST FEATURE IS ONE CLOSELY ALLIED WITH THE DAY'S NEWS

By W. L. ARGUE and MAIN JOHNSON
Toronto Star

"Which is the more important, news or features? Is the tendency drifting towards one or the other?"

NEWS still remains more important than features, but the tendency is drifting towards the latter. In spite of this tendency, however, and no matter how far it goes, news will always remain more important in a newspaper. Why?

W. L. Argue

Because the dividing line between news and features is vague. The more the so-called features encroach on the news, the more it will be seen that they themselves are essentially news. If they are not actually news, they form its background.

Take for example, the North American Newspaper Alliance. When it was formed in 1922, its object was to supply features in a co-operative way just as the Associated Press supplies news. This remains the purpose of the N. A. N. A. but, in practice, many of its articles are used as front page news stories.

When Harold Noice sailed from Nome last year to see what had happened to the Stefansson expedition on Wrangel Island, and when he discovered the tragedy there, the direct news of what had happened was common property to all newspapers.

But the North American Newspaper Alliance supplemented the news with a feature, Noice's own detailed story of what he had found, with extracts from Knight's diary. This was not news in the sense that it chronicled immediately events which had occurred, but it was news in the sense that it was an amplification of a primary news event, giving the details and atmosphere of the tragedy.

The Alliance also had its feature service on the recent adventures of the American airman, Major Martin, in Alaska during his part in the flight around the world.

It had the Sinclair features on the economic conditions of Europe when they were also matters of straight news interest.

All these series have been features rather than news, but they have had a news value. We would say, indeed, that the tendency of features is to ally themselves more and more closely with the news.

Radio would probably be listed among the features, but it is also news. Radio programs and reviews of them are actual spot news; general articles on radio are the background to the news of one of the spectacular developments of contemporary science.

Science, in many of its branches, is one of the most frequent sources of features in the present-day newspaper.

As an example of this, we can again legitimately refer to Toronto, for it was there that Dr. Banting carried on his experiments which resulted in his discovery of "insulin." That discovery and the definite events arising from it are news, but features giving the details and the history of the age-long fight against diabetes are also a part of the news.

To consider another angle of the subject, there are the features in such papers as the American Weekly, the Sunday magazine section of the Hearst newspapers. These features are, for the most part, intimately related to the news, being in many cases a co-ordination of scattered news stories into one feature article. This is a contrast with another, earlier type of feature which was more like an essay, a feature without any apparent timely reason.

Comics, too, are features, which, although not chronicling the events of any particular day or week do reflect, even in a distorted, grotesque way, certain prevalent tendencies in modern life. Their direct motive may be not anything like as pretentious as this; it may be merely to entertain, which in itself is a worthy ideal. But critics and analysts of civilization, including many of the most "highbrow" variety, see in the comics a picture of present-day life which they say is of value now and will be of value to historians in the future.

Many of the offerings of the various syndicates have their news as well as their feature value, either in the sense that their authors are people prominent at the moment or that the subjects they discuss are timely.

In newspapers which count among their features the work of their editorial promotion departments are those whose promotions form part of the news. They either develop news or create it.

To cite one recent instance from our own paper, the National Baby Week Council of Great Britain, in connection with the British Empire Exhibition being held this summer in London, is finding the "Empire's Bonniest Baby." This search was being made throughout the Empire. It would have had a news value of its own in Ontario, for Ontario children could have competed. This news value, however, was increased immeasurably in Ontario by the co-operation of the Toronto Star with the National Baby Week Council. The Star has been conducting the competition in Ontario for the Council. Entries in Ontario were sent direct to the paper; a local committee of judges is selecting the best entries and forwarding them to London for the Empire competition.

Instead of scattered individual entries from Ontario, there has been an avalanche. Entries were received by us from over 250 municipalities.

If you ask us, "What is your practical advice in reference to this issue of news versus features," we say: "Join the prevalent tendency towards features, but see that most of your features are so closely allied to the news that it is hard to tell where one ends and the other begins."

QUEER CIRCULATION STUNTS I HAVE MET—OR HAVE I?

By ROYAL W. WEILER
President, Allentown (Pa.) Call

WAS I supposed to catalogue queer circulation stunts? Am I to be the judge of what is a queer stunt? I fancy and hope that I was among friends when I started, and I hope to end that way. What may be construed as queer by Cook in Scranton may not so be construed by Fris in El Paso.

R. W. Weiler

Last year, you will recall, McKernan presented 85 best promotion plans by an equal number of circulators. Who would dare and be so bold as to say that no one in our entire membership considered one or more of these plans or stunts queer, yet they were all presented as best stunts.

However, if there should be queer stunts employed, I would just like to put in a good word for the old subscriber. Queer stunts, I imagine, are prosecuted to run up quickly and economically, although not necessarily the latter, a list of new subscriptions. You are going to cater to the non-reader and gather or inveigle him in. What about the old subscriber? Why pat the new subscriber on the back and give him a cuckoo of a clock, or an alarm clock whose chief claim to alarm is that it never went at all, while the old subscriber has to go to bed with the chickens and rise with the crow of the neighbor's rooster.

Why give the wife of the new subscriber a new handbag when the old subscriber continues to come in year after year to pay his subscription from an old pig skin leather wallet that opens like an accordion, bound with a long leather strap, and worn to the surface as smooth and slippery as an oil lease.

The old subscriber never asked for or got a rubber apron for his wife and baby nor an accident insurance policy against mule kicks —— Why not?—Because with cheering regularity he comes year after year, digs down into his jeans, pulls out a sweaty, neatly folded bill and pays his subscription, and then turns around never to be heard from again until another twelve months.

Who registers the most kicks? It's the finicky for-the-time-being subscriber who may or possibly should have been in jail when the old subscriber was helping us to establish a firm foundation in the years of real struggle—he may have even endorsed our notes when credit was none too good.

Every circulation manager's job is building circulation, and putting on subscriptions is often no real factor in circulation-building.

Queer circulation stunts tend to lower the dignity of the newspaper business, lessen the value of a subscription to the subscriber and depreciate the value of distribution to the advertiser.

Be able to say that your readers are taking your paper because they want it. That sounds better in theory than in practice, I will admit. However, I am firmly convinced that a circulation manager's greatest endeavor should be the production of a good salable newspaper, and no one in the entire organization knows better what is a good salable newspaper than the circulation manager. A live circulation manager must and does know the kind of newspaper the folks in his territory want and like to read. Then he must naturally follow up closely every essential that enters into the maintenance and development of a relationship between reader and office that even the queerest of queer circulation stunts of a competitive paper will not queer nor materially shake.

You'll have plenty of luck if you spend plenty of time looking for it.

COLLECT WEEKLY FROM COUNTRY AGENTS

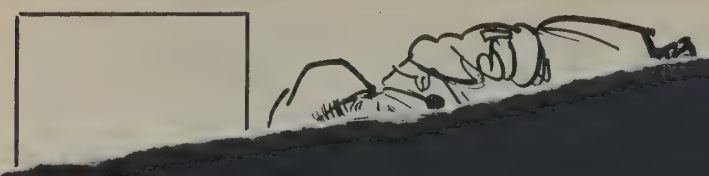
By J. O. STUARDI
Mobile Register & News-Item, Birmingham Age-Herald and Montgomery Journal

"A practical system of weekly collections from country dealers who collect monthly from their customers. How to bring it about."

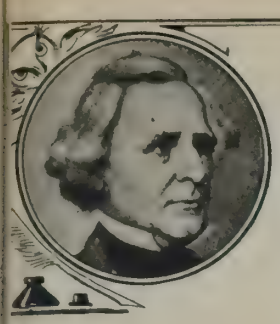
IN the true sense, weekly payments cannot be exacted from dealers who collect monthly—unless the dealer collects in advance, and pro-rates it into weekly payments. This would bring about a very unsatisfactory condition, giving the dealer opportunity to confiscate the full collections to his personal use, and leave the circulator high and dry for delivery service. It goes without saying that the dealer is bonded, but unless with a cash deposit, there probably would be much difficulty in regaining the money.

The Country Circulator is kept more closely in touch with his agents, when billing them weekly. The agent has a weekly record of his profits. If the agent is unsatisfactory, not good pay, the circulator quickly finds it out, and knows, even though he holds an iron-clad bond, that the agent will not pay, and the only resource, other than legal, is to secure a good agent. On the other hand, a monthly agent will owe for at least six weeks before you know that he is not going to pay his account, and more than likely has been giving his readers poor service for more than a month before you are aware of it. Another point in favor of weekly billing is in the saving of postage on promotion work—the promotion letter sent with the weekly bill has more weight than one sent alone, and a promotion note or letter at least every two weeks is a necessity—and has more effect if sent every week.

How to bring it about, of course, is by far the most difficult feature, but it can be done with sufficient effort. Some monthly subscribers must be transferred to a weekly basis. It is preferable to have the district representative, or road man, perform this task. The monthly percentage must be reduced to less than 50 per cent, because no agent will take money out of his pocket to pay his account for the first three weeks without collecting a cent from his subscribers. He may be willing to wait until the end of the month for his profit, and is willing to trust well known people for one month, but there is in every city a transient class, who cannot be trusted for a month, yet are bona-fide readers. There is another class who must be collected from when they have the money.



One advantage that Alabama newspapers have had for several years—the industrial and railroad employees have two pay days a month, generally on the 1st and 15th—makes collection easy.



I believe in billing all agents weekly and using every effort to bring about weekly payments of accounts, giving the circulator the advantage of knowing what the agent is doing, and the company having the money instead of the agent or the subscriber holding it for 30 days.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN-41 Years on the New York Herald staff

COPYRIGHT 1924 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER—ALL RIGHTS, INCLUDING FOREIGN RIGHTS, PROTECTED.

CHAPTER TEN

Mr. Bennett Visits His Mother in Scotland and Appoints European Correspondents

THE year 1838 began very auspiciously for Mr. Bennett. He was, as he said in a rather boastful editorial, "firmly entrenched in the ournalistic field." His intense desire was to cover all the news and to eat his less-enterprising contemporaries daily, if possible, on important ocal stories. He hired two young reporters to scour the city for news, giving the articles sensational headlines. Meanwhile his own satirical pen was not less busy.

In all this time his health had been good, his natural spirits buoyant under every scandal, trial and perplexity. His habits were most methodical; he rose early and retired about 10 p. m. He was frugal in personal expenditures; a hearty eater of plain food, and bathed daily.

The year's principal event was the opening of regular steam navigation across the Atlantic ocean. Rival companies in England each rushed ships to completion and the first two arrived in New York on the same dayApril 23. Thousands of citizens rushed to the waterfront to gaze at the vessels and the newspapers devoted columns to the story.

Mr. Bennett in a brilliant editorial welcomed them to America and dwelt upon the surpassing importance of their arrival. The names of the steamers were Sirius and Great Western.

So impressed was Mr. Bennett that he decided to go to Europe on one of them, though at considerable sacrifice. He was also impelled to visit his old and widowed mother. But for having such a talented and responsible editor as Atree to take charge of the Herald in his absence, he would not have dared to leave his interests in other hands at such a critical time and for so long a period. He sold at auction many of his books, some furniture and other effects, and with a replenished purse, he sailed from New York May 1, on the Sirius.

Arriving at Falmouth, England, May 19, he called on leading newspaper editors and publishers of London. They had all heard of the Scotsman who had gone to America and was revolutionizing the press of New York and he received a hearty welcome. After arranging for London correspondence for the Herald, Mr. Bennett took a steamer for Edinburgh.

His meeting with his mother is best told in his own words:

"Bless me, mother," said he, "how old you look! How old you look! How is your health? Sit down! Sit down How old you do look!"

"Twenty-three years," said she, "since I saw you—in that time your father and brother Cosmo have died—is enough to make me look old."

He spoke affectionately of his brother—whom he had hoped to train in journalism, so as to give him the management of the Herald in his own absence, but "death has frustrated my plans."

"Mother, I pay £16 a year for rent of a pew in St. Peter's Church."

"You do," replied his mother, "and I suppose you would place me in the head of it, if I were there."

"You should have the whole of it, mother, for I have never been there yet to take possession."

At the end of the second day he had to "tear himself away" from his loved ones. He was completing an account of his life's history when suddenly, glancing at his watch, he exclaimed:

"There! It is 10 o'clock. I must go now."

Then the tears began to flow. Bennett, almost overcome by his own feelings, endeavored to cheer up his sisters, aunt, and mother, saying:

"I'll come and see you again next summer, and I'll stay a week with you then."

Accompanied by two uncles and a cousin, who walked to Keith with him, where he took the coach, leaving behind him the scenes of his happy childhod. He returned to the UnitedStates on another new steamship, the Royal William, arriving in New York on Oct. 10, and received a hearty welcome from his friends. Everything at the Herald office he found in satisfactory condition. Atree had achieved quite a reputation as a brilliant and forcible writer and had also followed in his employer's traces as a witty punster, one of his skits being as follows:

"A Mr. McCadden wants us to puff his ready-made coffins, omitting, however, the usual compliment of sending us a specimen of his workmanship. He may be a very clever fellow in his way, but as for his wooden surtouts (box coats) we hope he may never have a customer for one as long as he lives. Put that in your pipe and smoke it, Mr. McCadden. We have spoken in praise of many articles of merchandise in our day and generation, but it does go a little against our grain to recommend any man's coffins to any human being."

GIANTS IN THOSE DAYS?

BENNETT the Elder knew not the Income Tax Collector. Existence of such an officer in 1839 would probably have kept the New York Herald's 40 percent profit a secret between Bennett and his bookkeeper.

He had yet to show himself and his followers how to spend a newspaper's earnings in the race for foreign and domestic news.

He could buy the best editorial brains for $20 a week, a sum which he vaunts as some six-figure journalistic incomes of today are blazoned.

He did not seek advertising—that sought him. He thought a $50,000 income notable, and its prospects coterminous with the city's growth.

Could he have visioned a city of 6,000,000 people, a newspaper earning $15,000,000 a year, from which it might take conservatively a $3,000,000 profit?

Could he have foreseen a staff of 2,000 people, whose aggregate paycheck each week would have devoured his income for a year?

But, what will Bennett in the Celestial Press Club, and the EDITOR AND PUBLISHER of 2009 A.D. have to say of 1924's giant? Will we be any greater in our generation than Bennett was in his?

On July 1, Mr. Bennett had to issue a double sheet to give the public an accumulation of matter—news and miscellany, drawing attention to the big paper by asking "Can it be equalled by any or all of the Wall Street papers"

Again on July 6, he wrote:

"A SIGN: One dollar was offered on Wednesday for a single copy of the Herald, and none to be had. If we could have printed 50,000 copies of the two previous days they would have been sold."

On July 17, 1839, he gave the public the first information as to the size of his staff and cost of publication:

"I employ 4 editors and reporters, to two of whom I gave $20 a week each. In my printing office I have 10 regular compositors, besides several extra hands. In the publication office, 2 clerks and 2 boys. In the pressroom, one engineer, one salesman, 2 pressman and 4 boys. I have 23 carriers and agents, and 200 newsboys on the streets. My expenses are nearly $30,000 per annum, and my receipts nearly $50,000, with a prospect only to be limited by the growth and prosperity of New York."

The arrival (in October, 1839) of the steamship "British Queen," the largest, fastest and most luxuriously furnished vessel afloat at that time, gave rise to a disagreeable incident. Its owners had invited the most prominent citizens of New York and the members of the press to a great dinner to be given on board. Mr. Bennett decided to go, but a friend informed him that Daniels, the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, would not attend if he did. This roused Mr. Bennett to pen the following bitter paragraph:

"A person by the name of Daniels, who publishes an obscure, dying, sneaking paper somewhere about town, without circulation or influence, asked: 'Is the creature Bennett to be there?' 'Yes.' 'Then I sha'n't go,' said this exquisite ass."

With redoubled energy and marvelous activity, Mr. Bennett proceeded to build up influential connections for his paper in every direction. He had appointed trained correspondents in Paris and the other capitals of Europe, whose timely and interesting letters arrived by foreign mail.

In the fall of 1839, he made his famous Southern tour, as a Charleston paper said, "the first New York editor to come down South to study conditions and acquaint himself with the views of our public men." Putting Atree in charge again, he went to Washington and attended a session of Congress, sending 56 long and brilliant letters to the Herald that enhanced its reputation and increased its circulation wonderfully.

Though he was a relentless antagonist when attacking an adversary in his editorial columns, yet Mr. Bennett was most humane and kind hearted in his treatment of those in distress, his generosity toward even an avowed foe, being evidenced in the following incident. A Mr. Price, who in the New Era had most maliciously slandered Mr. Bennett, suddenly found himself in great financial distress. No friend would aid him, and finally, reluctantly, he appealed to Mr. Bennett for assistance. His tears of gratitude flowed, as the editor promptly handed him the required sum of money to meet his necessities, without ever referring to Price's vindictive attacks, and the impoverished journalist became Bennett's friend and champion thereafter.

CREATING USERS FOR NEW PRODUCTS WITH SAMPLES AND NEWSPAPER COPY

Two Methods Can Be Synchronized Franklin Shows by Survey of Successful "Tie-Up" Campaigns—$15,000,000 Invested Yearly in Samples

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

HOW to create new users for a product is a problem which is equally important for the small concern just starting as for the $10,000,000 corporation.

"If we could put a sample of our chocolate in the hands of every person in the United States, we would lay the foundation for a tremendous market," the manager of a chocolate concern remarked the other day. Sampling the product to consumers has been and continues to be an important aid in building up demand.

Just where should newspaper advertising fit in the sampling plan? How may newspaper advertising be tied up to best advantage with sampling?

Many a man ate his first dish of Post Toasties as the result of a sample left at his home. Today Post Toasties advertising is featuring up the corn flake that stays crisp in milk or cream and the makers are offering to send a liberal test sample direct through the mail to all who inquire.

It is estimated that $15,000,000 a year is invested in sampling in its various forms. In some of the larger cities, house-to-house distributing organizations have grown up. The distribution of samples has proven an excellent lever in working on the jobbing and retail trades and in influencing consumers, but it need not work necessarily at cross purposes to newspaper advertising. In fact, it can be an ally in making newsprint space the more productive.

The makers of White King Granular Soap in perfecting distribution around Portland, Ore., distributed a full size package to each home. At the same time, newspaper copy apprized the housewives of the distribution and advised them to be on the watch for their own free package to give it a tryout.

The advertising also featured the uses of the product and the unique trade-mark, which is a King such as appears on playing cards. The copy also stated that all dealers would soon be ready to supply orders.

On a new product the Quaker Oats Company uses specialty salesmen, and local advertising, carrying a coupon dedeemable at the dealers' stores for full retail value.

The offer of an assortment at a special price through newspaper advertising has been productive for some companies. Proctor & Gamble offered a group of 6 soap products in this way. At Kansas City alone, 54,000 coupons were redeemed by dealers. Of course, there is a danger dealers may buy up a large number of newspapers to redeem the coupons. Sometimes manufacturers limit the redemption of coupons to a few selected dealers. Almost always the consumer is required to write her name and address, and it is specifically stated that only one coupon may be used by a family.

On May 16, the Mt. Zircon Water Company, Rumford, (Me.), which sells Mt. Zircon Ginger Champagne, a summer beverage, ran a "Try it" day. Large newspaper copy featured the product and told the reader to "clip the coupon and get your free drink now."

The Palmolive Company has been a large sampler through newspaper advertising. "10 shaves free" and a can of Palmolive after shaving talc on request to prove statements made in the company's advertising have proved convincing to many a man. Even though he does not send for a sample, there is something worth while implied in the willingness of the advertiser to supply them.

The dentrifices have been persistent samplers both through newspaper advertising, door-to-door and store distribution of samples as well as detail work to the dental trade. The enormous sale of Kotex must be credited in some degree to their "confidential coupon" offer, addressed to Ellen J. Buckland, G. N., care of the Cellucotton Laboratories.

A sales manager of a product selling through grocers has found that he gets more coupons redeemed when they are left from house to house by his crew than when he publishes a coupon in the local newspaper, but the former is so expensive that in many cities the latter is more economical in getting his distribution. He has found the fact the coupon is to appear in the paper is a help in approaching the trade.

"Buy two products for the price of one" is an appeal which many concerns have used in house-to-house sampling and which some now are employing in newspaper space. A company which makes a marshmallow cream and also a marshmallow candy recently offered a 25 cent container of each, total value, 50 cent, for a quarter to those who redeemed the coupon during the week of May 19. In one city, the offer proved especially popular and was continued for an additional week. The list of local dealers was printed in the copy. A recipe book, "How to make deserts delicious," was included.

When Colgate introduced Fab, the company not only used large newspaper advertising, but also put full size samples in the hands of women. The Colgate Company also has been a constant user of women crews, coupons left house-to-house and premiums.

While some leading soap concerns have found sending demonstrators from home to home to take orders to be filled through the local grocer their most effective (although costly) method of extending demand, nevertheless some of the most successful in the business are large users of the newspaper.

Last fall B. T. Babbitt bought full pages to feature Babbitt's Cleanser offer, 2 for the price of one, in huge handlettering. Two full cans were shown, there was brief copy, and a coupon, good for one full can free of charge if the reader bought another can at the regular price. The company paid the dealer for the free can at full retail price. It is customary for the manufacturers to send representatives through to redeem coupons on the spot in cash and, incidentally, book extra orders where possible, or to mail a check when the dealer sends them his coupons. The forthcoming newspaper-sampling is merchandised thoroughly by the salesmen to the trade in advance and sometimes a special deal is offered.

The Manhattan Soap Company, Chicago, has used full pages with coupons which entitle the person who clips them to get one cake of Sweetheart Toilet Soap free if presented to the dealer within ten days.

A toilet goods concern has had good success in sending samples of expensive face powder direct-by-mail to a list of 50 or 100 customers furnished by a druggist. Much direct-mail work of this kind is being carried on.

response to newspaper advertising send free a specimen board so the prospect can see how their Stormtight looks when applied to tin or composition roofing. The prospect is asked to mention the kind of roof. A request like this enables the manufacturer to mail a list of his local dealers and to refer the inquiry to them to close. Dealers appreciate being sent live inquiries from their town, particularly if the possible sale is for $10 or more.

The advertising department of a company which sells through drug and department stores wrote as follows to dealers who had stocked an initial order of a new member of its family of products:

"There has been sent to you today, all charges prepaid, a package containing the samples of ——— promised you by our salesman.

"As soon as you receive these samples, will you be so good as to telephone the advertising manager of the ——— that you have the samples and ask him to notify you a day or two in advance of the date when the first advertisement appears, so that you will have a chance to put in a display, and thus capitalize on the advertising to the fullest extent?

"If you need display material, write us at once, so that it may be sent in plenty of time to reach you in advance of the campaign."

The Russia Cement Company, Glou cester, Mass., manufacturer of Signe Ink and Le Page's Glue, have a sic product, Signet Hand Soap. They hav suggested to various stores that these or der ten cases each and have a special sa in which two cans instead of one will b offered for 15 cents retail. The manu facturer furnishes coupons which may b distributed door to door, or counters c with the store outgoing mail. A sheet c suggested advertisements to be used b the dealer in his own space in the loca newspaper also is supplied and the com pany offers to mail free an electro of th can.

This is in effect simply a slightly dif ferent form of sampling, which is bein used for various products to an increas ing extent.

Sampling has proved its value. It i here to stay. But in planning ways an means to sample, the manufacturer wi find it worth while, whenever he can, t give newspaper advertising a substantia place in the plan.

Of Interest to Furniture and Household Article Advertisers!

Of 56 Advertisers Using Any Detroit Paper 46 Show Decided Preference for the Detroit News and 28 Use The News Exclusively!

FURNITURE, household articles, washing machines, electrical appliances can be sold only to home makers. Transient or rooming house inhabitants are not interested in articles of this sort. To reach the homes, therefore, merchants of Detroit have always strived, and through actual experience they have learned that there is no factor so great in bringing people to their stores as the home read newspaper—The News.

Particularly is this true because The News' circulation is concentrated in the local trading area where access to advertised articles is easy.

Knowing this, Detroit furniture and household article merchants have not only used the bulk of their appropriations in The News but have also used more advertising measured in terms of space in The News.

Of 56 advertisers in this particular classification, 46 showed preference for The News, and 28 of these used no other paper but The News.

This is significant. It indicates not only which paper gets merchants the greatest returns, but it also proves conclusively the value of home delivered and home read circulation.

The most economical advertising in Detroit is News advertising. The leading Department Stores, Women's Wear Merchants, Grocers, Boot and Shoe advertisers confirm this fact in their preference for The News.

SPENCER, OF SEATTLE, NEW PRESIDENT OF PACIFIC COAST AD CLUBS

FRESNO, Cal., May 29.—Lloyd Spencer, past president of the Seattle, (Wash.) Advertising Club, was elected president of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs' Association at the closing session of the 4-day convention held in this city, commencing May 25.

Spencer, selected by the nominating committee as the sole choice for president, nearly lost the honor through the maneuvering of an insurgent group that had chosen Marshall Dana, associate editor of the Portland (Ore.) Journal as candidate.

Southern California joined with Oregon clubs in placing Dana's name before the convention, but these two groups withdrew their candidate's name after several delegations had served notice on the floor of the convention that they would back up the regular nominee.

With the presidential contest thus settled and convention elected by acclamation the remainder of the ticket and ratified the committee's action in choosing Seattle for the 1925 convention.

Other officers included:

Raymond P. Kelly, Spokane, re-elected president for Eastern Washington; Guy Llewelyn, Tacoma, director of the Tacoma Advertising Club, vice-president in Western Washington; Marshall Dana, Portland Club, vice-president in Oregon; W. C. Beaumont, president of the Fresno club, vice-president for Northern California and Hawaii; A. Cardman Smith, president of the Los Angeles club, vice-president of Southern California; Florence Gardner, secretary of the San Francisco club, vice-president of woman's participation.

Recommendation that the Honolulu club be admitted to membership in the Association at a flat rate of dues of $200 a year was adopted.

Resolutions adopted follow:

Endorsing the work of the universities and other educational institutions in teaching advertising, commending the Portland club for establishing a scholarship in advertising and urging similar action by other clubs.

Favoring the granting of charters to junior clubs in advertising formed in educational institutions.

Endorsing the 3-minute speaking contests and recommending that every district and international convention hold such contests, one to be on The Value of An Advertising Club to Its Community.

Resolutions of thanks to the individuals, organizations and Fresno city, who were responsible for the success of the convention.

Don Francisco of Los Angeles, the retiring president, was presented with a silver tea set by the association.

The trophy and medal winners are as follows:

Portland Advertising Club, perpetual trophy donated by Tacoma club to the best exhibit of constructive Better Business Bureau work; second prize, Oakland Advertising Club, Los Angeles club, perpetual trophy originally donated by that club for the best record of accomplishments during the year; H. A. Nater, Los Angeles, for the best 3-minute talk Monday; A. O. Loomis, Portland, for the best 3-minute talk Tuesday; Thomas Shore, San Diego, for the best 3-minute talk Wednesday.

Miss Alice Finch, Stockton, for the best talk before the financial department; Paul S. Armstrong, Los Angeles, for the most constructive address before the general sessions; W. A. Harmman, San Diego, for the most eloquent address before the general sessions.

Ralph P. Merritt, Fresno, for the most instructive address before the general sessions; San Francisco club, for the best stunt; Elliot Epsteen, San Francisco, for the most informative address before the Better Business Bureau departmental; San Francisco club, for the most constructive display of commercial art; Myers Company, Los Angeles, for the best direct-by-mail advertising exhibit; Bank of Italy, for the best display advertisement published by a banking publication; Bullocks, Los Angeles, for the finest exhibit of printed specimens; San Francisco Advertising Club, best display advertisements in which pictures were used.

Alice Irwin, Los Angeles, best address by a woman; Maurice Logan, San Francisco, best graphic arts exhibit.

The trophy for the club covering the most mileage in sending delegates to the convention went to San Francisco, 15,130 miles. The trophy for the club whose women delegates covered the greatest mileage also went to San Francisco, with 4,994 miles.

The best advertising agency exhibit prize went to the H. K. McCann Company of San Francisco.

A trophy donated by Peter Rasmussen, Fresno, for the best plan for community advertising went to the Seattle club.

W. P. Rogers of San Francisco won the award for the best exhibit of advertising by an individual.

Thomas Shore of the San Diego club won the final 3-minute speech contest with a perfect score of 10 points on the subject: "Should an Advertising Club Devote Most of Its Time to Advertising and Thereby Cater to Men and Women in Advertising?"

The cup was awarded by the Spokane club. Honorable mention were given by the judges, Judge C. E. Beaumont, F. A. Homan and G. E. Wentzel, to Miss Anna M. Brueggerhoff of Seattle and Raymond P. Kelly of Spokane.

THE movies have been vindicated, the practical scoffers routed. Cub reporters came into the estate deeded to them by the fictioners when two of them turned up the key clues that led to confessions by the murderers of Robert Franks in Chicago.

James Mulroy and Alvin D. Goldstein are the names by which the Chicago Daily News paymaster knows them, but they are now known to Newspaper Row, and probably will remain as "O'Connor and Goldberg" to the end of their newspaper days.

Cubs they were and cub jobs were given them when the Franks murder trail was still cold. Two weeks ago "O'Connor and Goldberg" were chasing pictures, getting press bureau handouts, running down minor details that were too trivial for real reporters. Then, on the morning of May 21, Mulroy was holding down a dark corner of the Daily News local room when the city desk got a tip to "see Sam Ettelson about a kidnapping." The city editor looked around and his eye met Mulroy's. "Go see Ettelson," was the order.

Ettelson, former State's Attorney of Illinois, now corporation counsel and a friend of the Franks family, didn't like to tell about the kidnapping of the 14-year-old son of his friend, Jacob Franks, but Mulroy wheedled the details out of him. He didn't print the story, for fear that publication might imperil the life of the kidnapped boy. He got his pal Goldstein and the hunt started.

Goldstein hustled out to Hegewisch, where the body of an unidentified boy had been found nude under a railroad culvert. Mulroy went to the Franks house and Goldstein telephoned a description of the body to him there. Apparently it was a cold scent. Eyeglasses had been found near the body in Chicago's fringes and the Franks boy had never worn glasses. Franks, Sr., wouldn't listen to the theory that the body might be that of his son, but at length Goldstein and Mulroy prevailed upon the boy's uncle to look at the body.

By that time, Ettelson had told his story to other newspaper men and another reporter joined the Daily News men and the uncle on the ride to the morgue. Nevertheless, "O'Connor and Goldberg" beat the city by an edition on the identification story.

That brought the "big league" reporters out but Mulroy and Goldstein couldn't be chased. They are said to have eaten and slept in relays, one of them staying on the job all the time. They canvassed all of East 63d street until they found the drug store which was to have been the kidnappers' rendezvous with the boy's father. Also, in the course of their travels they ran into young Loeb, and Goldstein heard from him a chance statement that "If I was going to kill any kid, I'd pick just such a fresh little —— —— as that Franks kid."

And then, while veteran reporters and detectives were looking for fresh leads, Goldstein and Mulroy went to the University of Chicago campus and dug out samples of typewriting done by Leopold months ago. These were taken to a typewriter expert who, after a minute examination, declared the ransom letter had been typed on the same machine and by the same hands as these class room notes.

After turning over this find to the city editor and the police, the two cubs went back to the University and located 4 students who testified that Leopold had owned a portable machine. Confronted with this unexpected evidence and other testimony, the defiance of Leopold and Loeb cracked. Their confessions followed soon after.

FRANKS MURDER SHOCKS PUBLIC

Newspaper Sales Skyrocket in Chicago When Youths Confess

CHICAGO, June 5.—What veteran newspapermen consider the biggest crime story of the generation, the Franks kidnapping and murder and its subsequent weird solution, brought with it possibly the greatest over-night circulation increase in newspaper history of America.

Not even during the early days of the war did circulation figures of Chicago newspapers skyrocket as they did when the two millionaire boys, Nathan Leopold and Richard Loeb, confessed to the slaying of their 14-year-old neighbor.

The confessions occurred at about 7 a. m. and came like the bursting of a bomb-shell to Chicagoans who had been but mildly interested in the retention of these two boys by the police. The Tribune and the Herald and Examiner had extras on the streets within a few minutes.

The Evening American reported that its circulation for that day exceeded by approximately 90,000 its normal Saturday total. The Journal declared that it sold nearly 100,000 extra copies. The Post's circulation on the day of the confessions was announced as approximately 18,000 more than normal.

The Tribune, the Daily News and the Herald and Examiner did not make estimates, but declared that they had enormous increases.

Interest in the Gibbons-Carpentier fight of that day dwindled.

Hundreds stand in line in Philadelphia to buy the Sunday Transcript. This is not true as to any other publication on earth. Seventy-five years without soliciting an advertisement.

The return of George Harvey

George Harvey—journalist, editor and diplomat, who just completed his service as American Ambassador to Great Britain—assumed editorial direction of The Washington Post on June 1.

The return of Colonel Harvey to public life in America is not only a triumph of newspaper enterprise—but an event of outstanding political importance.

Colonel Harvey needs no introduction to newspaper readers. For more than a quarter century, his fearless expression of views on matters of great public interest, from the platform and through Harvey's Weekly and the North American Review, made him one of the conspicuous figures in the life of the nation.

"Maker of Presidents" is what contemporary historians call him. His political sagacity and foresight contributed largely to the nomination and election of Presidents Cleveland, Wilson and Harding.

What Colonel Harvey will say during the conventions and in the coming Presidential campaign has already aroused speculation. Editorials in The Washington Post from Colonel Harvey's pen will command immediate and nation-wide attention.

What Colonel Harvey will say about the relations of America and Europe is being eagerly awaited by statesmen here and abroad.

Freed from three years of diplomatic restraint, Colonel Harvey's comments in the "Post" on world problems will be of extraordinary interest and international importance.

Colonel Harvey will write exclusively for The Washington Post.

NEW YORK BULLETIN MAY PUBLISH SUNDAY EVENING EDITION

Flaherty, General Manager Enwright's New Daily, Announces Staff Appointments, Mechanical, Publishing and Distribution Plans—To Appear Shortly After June 16

NEW YORK may have a new Sunday afternoon newspaper as well as a new evening daily, according to Frank B. Flaherty, general manager for Frederick W. Enwright, Boston and Lynn, Mass., publisher, who is promoting the New York Evening Bulletin.

F. W. Enwright

The new newspaper will be sold for two cents, Mr. Flaherty informed Editor & Publisher.

Flaherty started the Sunday New York Evening Telegram, when he was general manager of that newspaper under James Gordon Bennett.

"It proved very successful," he said, "and I think a Sunday New York Bulletin, would be favorably received and meet with equal success. While Mr. Enwright is opposed at present, I believe I can convince him."

With June 16, as the date set for first appearance of the Bulletin, possibility of some delay loomed this week when workmen encountered rock while digging pits for the presses in the building at 350 to 356 West Thirty-first street.

Full details regarding staff appointments, publishing and distributing plans were announced by Flaherty this week.

"We are making every effort to be on the street June 16," Flaherty declared, but admitted possibility of delay due to the rock formation uncovered.

Two pits are being dug for the present, although 4 presses will eventually be installed, Flaherty said. Two presses have arrived at the plant ready for installation as soon as the pits are completed. They are 24-page Duplex machines. Complete stereotype equipment has been ordered together with a battery of 21 of the latest Mergenthaler linotypes.

Editor & Publisher found Flaherty on the ground floor of the Bulletin building. He was enthusiastic over the future of Enwright's New York enterprise.

"I was making money in real estate," he said, "and was drafted by Enwright for this general manager's position much against my will. However, I feel there is need for a real Democratic newspaper in New York.

"My belief has been confirmed by the letters we have been receiving since we announced our plans. Nearly 700 letters have reached us from prominent New York State Democrats backing our venture."

Flaherty showed a letter received from Gov. Alfred E. Smith declaring it was typical. The Governor requested that his subscription be entered and stated he was "pleased to learn that New York is to have a new evening newspaper devoted to the principles of the Democratic party."

The general manager was asked if Tammany Hall or the Democratic party was backing the newspaper financially.

"You can say," he said, "that Mr. Flaherty emphatically denied there is any political money behind the Bulletin. It comes entirely from Mr. Enwright and his friends."

Flaherty went on to explain how Enwright began in a small way in Lynn, prospered, and successfully forced his way into the Boston field, declaring his success has inspired the confidence of many rich men, who are willing to assist him in entering New York.

"We consider we are very fortunate in having this location near the Pennsylvania station," Flaherty continued. "It is a coincident that just prior to James Gordon Bennett's death, I went with him over this vicinity and picked a site for the New York Herald on this same street.

"We have taken a 12 year lease on this building, and have a renewal clause entitling us to 10 more, if we wish it."

The Bulletin will use the basement, ground floor, and fifth floor of the building. Application has been made for space on the second floor. All floors measure 80 x 100 feet.

The press room will be located in the basement. The rear of the first floor, which extends out beyond the second, is well lighted by glass sky-lights, and will be used as a composing room and stereotype room. A partition will separate it from the editorial rooms, while the business department will be nearest the street. The entire fifth floor will be used by the advertising department.

Distribution of the new newspaper is being arranged for by William Guilfoyle, for many years with the old New York Globe, and recently with the New York Evening Post. He is providing means for an automobile delivery, Flaherty said.

Staff appointments were also announced by Flaherty.

John B. Gallagher, former advertising agent, will be advertising director. J. B. Sawyer, at one time with the New York Herald will be advertising manager of the Bulletin. John R. Hays, for 7 years with the New York Times and 15 years with the New York Herald, has been appointed mechanical superintendent.

As announced last week by Editor & Publisher, Snowden H. Summers, will be editor of the Bulletin. He will have an editorial staff of 26 men. Alex Sullivan, for 12 years on the staff of the New York Evening World, will be sporting editor; John R. Gren, automobile editor; Edward Cole, turf writer; and George Boothby, political writer.

Flaherty declared the Bulletin will take the service of the United Press Associations, and the Standard News. An application has been made for membership in the City News Association, he said.

PROTEST U. S. OPTICAL ADS

Canadian Optometrists Claim Mail Order Goods Cheap and Defective

Protests have been lodged with the publishers located in the maritime provinces of Canada against acceptance of advertising from United States optical supply firms. The protests have been made by the maritime optometrical organization. The body of optometrists and opticians contends that all of the advertisements inserted by the United States optical supply houses are misleading. It is claimed that the glasses secured through the mail order treatment prescribed, are ruinous to the eyes, and are of cheap, ordinary glass.

Some of the publishers have notified the optometrical organization that the advertising would be pending an investigation as to the merits or demerits of the advertisers. Others have taken no action as yet. A few have withdrawn the advertising without an investigation. It is stated that the advertising was particularly effective in the newspapers with much rural circulation. Representatives of the U. S. optical supply concerns contend that the move of the optometrists was caused not by interest in the welfare of the readers of the newspapers but because of the heavy inroads on their business caused by the advertising.

Lyons Proposes $1 Pulp Tax

Predicting the policy would be followed by the Ontario government, James Lyons, Provincial Minister of Lands and Forests, advocated an export tax of $1 a cord on all pulpwood shipped to the United States in a statement issued in Port William, Ont., May 30. Lyons declared the tax would be increased to a point where it would conserve all Canadian pulpwood for Dominion mills.

A.B.C. MEETS IN TORONTO

Board of Directors Pays Visit to Canadian City

A meeting of the board of directors of the Audit Bureau of Circulations was held in Toronto on May 29, followed by a dinner, attended by some 150 members and friends of the organization. At the dinner, which was held at the King Edward Hotel, William Findlay, of the McKim Advertising Agency, acted as toastmaster and among the speakers were Colonel J. B. Maclean, president of the Maclean Publishing Company, Toronto; O. C. Harn, president of the Bureau; John Sifton, Winnipeg Free Press; Walter Strong, Chicago Daily News; F. I. Kerr, Hamilton Spectator and J. M. Gibbon, director of publicity of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The addresses generally emphasized the influence of the A. B. C. in reducing advertising and circulation to a scientific basis. Directors of publications and advertising managers alike spoke of their satisfaction in the work accomplished.

The visitors from the United States present included O. C. Harn, executive of the National Lead Company; W. M. Laughlin of Armour & Co.; W. A. Strong, Chicago Daily News; E. R. Shaw, Power Plant Engineering, Chicago; Mason Britton, McGraw-Hill Company, New York; Marco Morrow, Capper Publications; F. W. Stone, American Review of Reviews; F. R. Davis, General Electric Company; D. P. Plumb, Troy Record; W. W. Wheeler, Pompeian Manufacturing Company, C.; W. F. Hoffman, manager of the New Stanley Claguee, managing director A. B. York office, and E. W. Chandler, chief auditor.

A PROFITABLE INVESTMENT

We consider it an unsound transaction to permit a customer to overequip his office or to buy a Linotype until his business justifies it. We do not therefore encourage the purchase of any Linotype unless, in our judgment, it will prove a profitable investment to the man who buys it.

SELLING YOUR MARKET

A NEWSPAPER sells to an advertiser something more than circulation coverage, reader confidence, excellence of printing and all other elements which are integral parts of the newspaper itself.

A newspaper sells to an advertiser a market for his merchandise.

This is trite and elemental, but needs constant reiteration.

To sell your local market to an advertiser you must know it, not in theory, not according to foolish pride, not by dabbling hearsay, but know it in the terms of scientific and modern commercial investigation, as a banker investigates a subject before investing capital or as a thorough-going merchant lays out the ground for his expensive trading venture.

So-called newspaper "merchandising departments" are increasing in number throughout the country. They are poorly named. They are not merchandising departments but market information bureaus, unless they are actually placing merchandise, and EDITOR & PUBLISHER, for many reasons, is by no means convinced that the latter is the legitimate function of any newspaper.

But information service is the legitimate function of every newspaper, both in its columns for the reading public and through its advertising departments for its advertising clients. There are common-sense limitations, too obvious to merit discussion. But there is no limit to the principle that this day and age calls for service to the man who spends money with you and rightfully expects full value.

As you are selling more than circulation, in our opinion, you should be prepared to deal with your customer in the terms of information pertinent to his object in buying your space. From every point of view, particularly selfish interest, you want him to succeed in his venture made through the medium of your newspaper. If there are, in his scheme, through ignorance of the subject, illogical phases, if he seeks to sell fence rails to city folks, snow shoes in the orange belt or carry coals to Newcastle, your function is to warn him off. By the same token, real information of a local market means magic manifolding of opportunities for new trade through advertising channels.

What do you actually know of the struggle that is going on around you in commerce? Just to mention one feature, what do you know of the bitter life and death struggle of the corner grocer against the chain store and its more scientific methods, which seem wholly out of the reach of the old-fashioned tradesman? It is one of the tragedies of modern life. A few men are resourceful and progressive enough to find methods by which to defeat the invasion of chain stores, with lower prices due to mass buying and skillful management, but many perish. This problem is local to many cities and embraces so many elements of the remorseless warfare in modern business that a study of it by any advertising man will open to him whole new vistas of thought and action.

It isn't much of a trick, not very expensive nor laborious, to set up in the average office comprehensive and accurate lists of trading accounts—lists of the various retailers and wholesalers, lists of branded goods, specialty salesmen of various kinds and the statistics of the city. More work and time are required for true analysis of the merchandise trends of a city, such as the leading sellers in various districts, but even that would be possible within a short time to the average ingenious newspaper man assigned to it. One of the benefits from such an enterprise will be a fresh understanding, even a new thrill of enthusiasm, among the men who undertake such work. They will know from first hand contact what advertising really means in your town. The big benefit, of course, is that when the advertiser comes along you will speak to him in a language he understands.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER is constantly called upon by the advertising agencies for information regarding local markets and it is amazing how intense this drive is becoming. They want to know—tell 'em!

The "bobbed-haired bandit's" hair was not bobbed. Retrieve, if you can, that little error cast upon the consciousness of the reading public and reiterated millions of times.

PROVERBS

CHAPTER XX. 5

Counsel in the heart of man is like deep water; but a man of understanding will draw it out.

TESTING HIS WINGS

THE city editor of a newspaper in the South asks EDITOR & PUBLISHER for advice. He recites his manifold duties, long hours and responsibilities, gives his wage as $42.50 per week, and sees nothing ahead except the managing editor's desk, and the managing editor is in the prime of life. He wants a comparable job in a larger city, where he can advance. Shall he make the leap?

Certainly! But not in the dark. Have a landing in view before both feet leave terra firma. No man worthy of the name stays put in a blind alley and our friend writes like a young gentleman destined to go somewhere in particular, except that there is a note of discontent as to the volume of responsibility he is carrying. Every earnest man in newspaper work accepts all his back can bear and it's wonderful how much punishment the old spine will take, and beg for more, when rewards justify the struggle. Our young friend is receiving the average wage—in fact, there are many able men ready to take the job when he relinquishes it.

Happiness, even if shallow, is worth promoting, and there is no pleasanter tonic for the average mind than style in clothes. Therefore the "dress-up" campaign has merit, aside from the commercial motive, typical of the age in which we live.

HINDSIGHT

THE "criminal physiognomy" of the Chicago boy slayers is now described by cut-line writers. As good a man as Lindsay Dennison, of the New York Evening World, in interviewing young Leopold in his cell noticed "his wolfish smile." He also observed the "angel face" of young Loeb. What nonsense! From the pictures we have seen, the important angle is that these normal appearing boys, typical of any campus, were capable of the atrocity they confessed. Either one of these young Jews would formerly have been received by the average man with no thought of criminality.

CIRCULATORS

THE week's meeting of the circulators at Louisville, under the auspices of the I. C. M. A., serves again to remind all interested in journalism of the power of the man behind the gun—the man who makes effective the service of the legion of contributors to daily journalism.

There was a day in the newspaper business when the circulation department was a minor consideration. Today the truly scientific editor sits with the circulation manager at his right elbow, and regards him in the same sense as the pitcher on the diamond regards the catcher. And, indeed, as the catcher is the pivot of the game of ball, so is the circulator in this day the pivot of the daily newspaper.

There are more tricks of the circulators' trade than in any other department of the newspaper. They are the stock-in-trade of the men who practice them. Hence, we do not often hear the whole story told, a pardonable fault, but if the average circulator is not particularly articulate on specific subjects in his work, he knows how to speak up in meeting in general review of his function, and the brass tack talk at Louisville is commended for careful perusal by all those who are seeking newspaper success.

We learn, among many things of value, that the trend of newspaper making is toward features, but the latter are developing a constantly increased news angle. The feature that punches is based upon current news, again emphasizing the point that the time element in feature work is of as great importance as in straight news.

The circulators are thinking along straight lines when they fight such evils as the return privilege to such outlets as the railroad news companies, long merciless dictators. It is sound theory that the winning method is to create a demand for your paper and the news companies will come to you on your terms.

Newspapers operating radio broadcasting stations are said to make the most effective use of radio sections, and as this seems equally true on the advertising side, the local broadcasting outfit appears to have greater use than a mere prestige builder.

Premiums, the circulators again remind us, when given to new subscribers, work an injustice to old subscribers and are therefore a baneful influence.

Such are the vital subjects in the minds of the circulation men of the country.

Sit close to your circulation manager, Mr. Editor and Mr. Publisher. Value him. Understand his difficult problem. Do not override him or permit other more bizarre departments to crowd him into the sideline. Probably no one on your paper has such intimate knowledge of your audience, its likes and dislikes. Few men of your city have a keener understanding of the commerce of the people, or wider acquaintance or more true friends, than your good circulation manager. We do not know a highly successful newspaper man in America who is not from the circulation department or in spirit with it.

An advertising salesman says: "My prospect says things about the paper which are not true and if I start to correct him he thinks me an argumentative bore. What shall I do?" There are effective ways of saying things without arguing them and there are ways of reaching unreasonable men, but one either knows how or he doesn't. No one can tell him.

BLIND ADVERTISING

WE are surprised to notice on page one of the Columbus (O.) Evening Dispatch, for May 12, a two-column news spread given to Hayward Thompson, ex-marine, who is going over the country exhibiting a "blindfold auto ride," as a means of press agenting an automobile sport model, a near-beer, and such local hotels and retail merchandise establishments as he may succeed in roping. The good Dispatch permitted this press agent to play his game through to the limit of a reader's endurance, mentioning all of the advertised wares in the news space and even going into their merits. Thompson puts on a theatrical and mystifying drive through city streets through some hokum, but his advertising scheme is about as raw as they come.

ASSOCIATION CHIEFS

FRIEND W. RICHARDSON, Governor of California, was last week elected president of the California Press Association for the 22d time.

F. W. RICHARDSON

For these 22 years Gov. Richardson has been more than merely an official head of the California press; he has been the working force in the organization, the mind behind the activities, the moving power. His first newspaper connection was with the San Bernardino (Cal.) Daily Times-Index, to which job he went from the clerkship of the county court. In 2 years he was owner of the Times-Index. In 1901, he purchased the Berkley Daily Gazette.

In 1911, Richardson was appointed state printer by Gov. Hiram Johnson. He put this office on an efficiency basis and made a big reduction in the cost of printing school books and in the state's general work.

Receiving the nomination an endorsement of 3 leading parties, he ran for the office of state treasurer in 1914 and was elected. He was re-elected in 1918 by a large plurality.

Richardson's campaign for governor was conducted entirely by a newspaper men's campaign committee, under the lieutenancy of George D. Squire, attorney for the California Press Association, and was remarkable for the unanimity with which publishers of dailies and weeklies all over the state gave their support and their advertising and news columns to the cause.

President, Charles P. Howard; first vice-president, George F. Beach; second vice-president, William R. Trotter; secretary-treasurer, William A. Aldrich.

L. A. Schneider, formerly foreman of the composing room of the Buffalo (N. Y.) News is now foreman of the composing room of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Herald, succeeding James A. Scanlon, resigned.

J. L. Gilbert, linotype operator, San Antonio Express, has been elected president of San Antonio Typographical Union No. 172.

Harvey C. Morse, of the mechanical department of the Marlboro (Mass.) Daily Enterprise, has been elected president of the Marlboro-Hudson Typographical Union, succeeding C. E. Crocker.

MINNESOTA DAILY STAR SOLD FOR $150,000

Group Headed by Thompson, Van Lear and Bratter Takes Control, Ending Receivership—To Continue Progressive Policy

MINNEAPOLIS, Minn., June 2.—Sale of the Minnesota Daily Star and termination of the receivership of the Northwest Publishing Company, former publishers, was approved by Judge H. D. Dickinson in Hennepin county district court, Monday, June 2.

The Minneapolis Daily Star Company, a new Delaware corporation organized by John Thompson, business manager of the old company; Thomas Van Lear, former president of the Northwest Publishing Company, H. D. Bratter, and other associates, took over the plant, building and good will of the Star.

Under the terms of the sale, the new company agrees to assume all mortgages and other secured obligations of the old company, to pay $35,000 in cash, $15,000 in September, and $100,000 in monthly payments, beginning in April, 1925.

The Star Company Thursday filed a certificate copy of articles of incorporation as entered in Delaware in the office the Secretary of State of Minnesota. The capital stock of the new company is given as $500,000 of which $100,000 is represented in Minnesota. Subscribers to the capital stock are T. L. Croteau, M. A. Bruce, A. M. Hooven, all of Wilmington, Del. H. D. Bratter of Minneapolis is named as secretary in the articles.

Acceptance of the bid was recommended by George B. Leonard, attorney for Albert Dollenmayer, receiver of the old company. The bid was the result of negotiations covering a period of several weeks, Dollenmayer said, and aimed to cover the full appraised value of the company's building, plant and good will.

"The new company has framed its bid on that basis," George B. Leonard, attorney for the receiver stated to the court, recommending its acceptance, and, "of course, the new company is entitled to the good will of the reading and advertising public."

Leonard announced that the "policy of the Star will be continued along the same progressive lines it has followed from the beginning."

Judge Dickinson paid a high compliment to the receiver and his attorney for their untiring efforts in bringing about the successful result of the re-organization.

W. C. Robertson, managing editor of the old paper, has been named editor of the paper; Mel Turnbull, formerly news editor becomes managing editor; and M. W. Halloran comes from the copy desk of the Minneapolis Tribune to be city editor.

The S. C. Beckwith Company, New York, will continue to represent the Star.

RETRACT VANDERBILT CHARGE

Los Angeles Dailies Correct Stories of Court Suit

Retractions demanded by Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., editor and publisher of the Los Angeles Illustrated Daily News, and the San Francisco Illustrated Daily Herald, of statements published concerning Vanderbilt Newspapers, Inc., were printed May 30 by the Los Angeles Times, the Los Angeles Express and the Los Angeles Record.

The stories objected to by Vanderbilt concerned a suit brought against Vanderbilt Newspapers, Inc., by two stockholders who claimed they had been misled into buying shares. Their complaint charged that William H. Vanderbilt named as a large stockholder in the Vanderbilt enterprise, was not now living. On information that the man named was a cousin of Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., residing in Boston, the correction was made by the newspapers originally carrying the story.

A. M., WORK; P. M., PLAY, S.N.P.A. PROGRAM

Publishers Will Celebrate July 4 Amid Familiar Asheville Scenes—New By-Laws Will Be Scanned

Arrangements are being made for the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association annual meeting at Grove Park Inn, Asheville, N. C., July 3, 4 and 5 provide that all business sessions will be held in the forenoon, leaving the afternoons for entertainment and recreation. Sessions will begin at 9:30 a.m. and continue until 1:30 p.m.

The opening session will be given over to the annual reports of the officers, and committee chairman, followed by a general discussion of the reports, and other matters,

Friday being Independence Day two addresses on pertinent subjects will be delivered by leading speakers. Following these, association activities will be discussed. The nominating committee will laso make its report at this session.

Saturday will continue the program. All phases of the newspaper profession will be discussed including the editorial, the business office, mechanical, and labor situation.

The association was recently incorporated and new by-laws will be presented for approval of the membership.

President Arthur G. Newmyer will preside over all sessions.

A golf tournament has been arranged as part of the entertainment program, with a number of trophies for men and women players.

A special invitation has been extended by W. L. Alexander, owner of the Mayview Hotel, Blowing Rock, N. C., to leave Asheville Saturday afternoon following the convention and spend Sunday in Blowing Rock inspecting this new hotel.

An entertainment program for each evening is being arranged by F. L. Seely, proprietor of the Grove Park Inn.

The past year has been very active, stated Secretary Johnson recently. Among some of the important accomplishments Mr. Johnson mentioned the success the association had in bringing about a readjustment of freight rates on news print south bound. He also referred to the reduction obtained in rates on iron and paper cores north bound. The eradjusment of freight rates, he said, had received close attention of the association throughout the year.

MORGAN BUYS GAZETTE

Changes It to Herald and Will Conduct It With Hutchinson News

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

HUTCHINSON, Kan., June 3.—The News Company, publisher of the Daily News, has purchased the Gazette, its morning contemporary, and has changed the name to the Hutchinson Herald. The papers will be conducted as complete individual units under the management of W. Y. Morgan, for many years publisher of the News. Fred Henney, managing editor of the News will be managing editor of both papers.

The Gazette stated that the sale had been made because of inability to make revenue equal expenses. The News announcement was that by the economies possible in its new building and plant, it would be able to print two good newspapers "where before there had been only one good and one trying to be good."

Both papers are members of the Associated Press. The Gazette was established 22 years ago. The News recently celebrated its golden jubilee.

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

HUGH O'DONNELL—Makes His Talents Work.

BUSINESS men are frequently mere nose-to-the-grindstone fellows who have no thoughts of interest outside of their immediate work. But Hugh A. O'Donnell, assistant business manager of the New York Times, belies the usual. His mind has been polished brilliant by varied experiences. He has not reached his present position, as so many so-called successful persons do, by following that terrible rule of "keeping everlastingly at it." He has enjoyed life by living it—not by working at it.

He can discuss news authoritatively, as well as advertising; personalities, as well as circulation figures; drama, art, or literature as convincingly as labor problems.

Assistant business manager, as a title, means that O'Donnell has supervision, in an advisory capacity, over labor, circulation, and advertising matters for the Times, but one is certain that this triangle of business interest has not become in the least a question of stilted routine for him.

"There is no typical day for me," he will tell you. "Any department of a newspaper is facinating, most alluring. Yesterday is ancient history. Today hasn't happened. You are constantly dealing with the ever present. The affairs of the business department are just as new daily and just as enthralling as the affairs of a news department. With advertisers, one is dealing with the survival of the fittest, the successes of the community."

And, knowing O'Donnell, when one hears him make a statement like this, one is confident there is no need for a Woodward hero to come along and "debunk" it.

O'Donnell doesn't talk much about himself, which is quite peculiar, since he was once an actor. But he does like to talk about the Times, and the personalities who have made that newspaper so successful.

Adolph Ochs, publisher of the Times, he will describe to you as a "genius."

"He ran away from all established methods in the conduct of the Times. He did just one thing: he sold the news and news only, while the old method was to sell sensations, features, and interesting reading, whether it was true or not. Mr. Ochs is essentially practical. He has carved his way in life, starting at the very bottom, and he has carved his life in lasting stone."

O'Donnell also pays tribute to Louis Wiley, the Times business manager.

"In all my newspaper career, I have never known a newspaper manager with as much business ability from an executive as well as detail standpoint as Louis Wiley," he declares.

This interviewer, however, wanted O'Donnell's opinions on newspaper making, not newspaper makers. Knowing him to be a man with editorial as well as business experience, an attempt was made to start an argument by mentioning Irvin Cobb's recent opinion that the Times failed in being a great newspaper, in that it lacked a sense of humor. O'Donnell was quick to reply.

"The psychology of a morning newspaper is absolutely opposed to humor," he said. "When a man gets out of bed and picks up his paper, he wants to get right at the facts of life, not its jokes. Cartoons and features are all very well in the evening, when the reader is seeking relaxation after a busy day."

Discussion of news lead to the subject of the greatest news story of this generation from a newspaper man's angle. O'Donnell, who is a newspaper man to his finger tips, dispensed with the war, the oil investigations, and the Franks murder, now in the press.

"The Harry K. Thaw case was the greatest news story from the angle of newspaper men that this generation has seen," he declared. "It had all the elements that go to make a good news story—aristocracy, wealth, youth, beauty, tragedy, insanity, sex, fear, mystery, marriage, and prolongation. The only other story I think could beat it would be the kidnapping of the Prince of Wales.

"The Thaw case, with its many ramifications, has permeated a generation, and has run in the newspapers like a serial novel."

Just here the interview was interrupted, and the writer had opportunity to watch the Times censorship of advertising in operation. O'Donnell is chairman of the advertising censorship board. All new advertising must be approved by 5 Times executives, coming to O'Donnell, last before it is run. The 4 executives besides O'Donnell are Arnold Sanchez, office manager, F. W. Harold, J. M. Kirhner, and B. T. Butterworth, advertising manager.

A clerk brought in some copy advertising a rubber reducing girdle. O'Donnell gave his approval to it under the signatures of the others.

After college days, spent at Notre Dame University, O'Donnell first became manager of a club at Appleton, Wis. This position he left for a stage career.—"My post-graduate course in education," he calls it.

As juvenile and in supporting roles he played with Fanny Davenport in the Sardou plays, "La Tosca," "Fedora," "Cleopatra," and "Gismonda." He also supported Blanch Walsh and Melbourne McDowell in "The Royal Box."

Then he entered newspaper work, first as special writer, then successively Sunday editor, promotion manager, and dramatic critic, of the Minneapolis Tribune. After this experience up-stairs, he went downstairs, becoming circulation manager of the St. Paul Pioneer-Press. Leaving this position, he became manager of the Randall Printing Company, in St. Paul. Shortly afterwards he went to Chicago to accept the position of State street advertising manager of the Chicago Record-Herald. From this he became advertising manager of the Minneapolis Journal, and then business manager of the Philadelphia Press.

The thrill of O'Donnell's first contact with the footlights lingered, and for a while he gave up newspaper work to give lectures, which became known as "O'Donnellogs." For 3 years he gave his travel lectures in American theaters. His itinerary carried him all over South America, Africa, and Europe, particularly the Mediterranean countries.

When the World War started, he quit traveling, and went to New Orleans, where he became publisher and editor of the New Orleans American. When that newspaper went out of business, he came to the Times.

"On the New Orleans American, I was too much editor," is how O'Donnell describes this experience. "Half the town wanted to elect me mayor, and the other half wanted to kill me. The latter nearly succeeded."

As a matter of fact, an outstanding accomplishment in O'Donnell's varied career, was his battle against the political machine in New Orleans, through his newspaper, the American. Single handed he fought the municipal administration which had been in power 16 years. His persecution by the politicians won for him the backing of the Citizens' League and the churches. After a sensational libel battle which was carried to the Supreme Court of Louisiana, he was vindicated and made a hero by his acquittal.

"There isn't any talent one may have, nor any experience, which one cannot find of value in the newspaper business," O'Donnell said in the course of a conversation I once had with him.

The quotation is a good ending for this article.

In Motor Vehicle Registration Licenses and Revenues New York Leads the Nation

New York State has more than doubled her automobile ownership in the last five years.

This means that there are 1,204,213 motor cars registered in New York State, ranking the state first in the Union. Of these, 962,681 are private passenger cars and 203,846 motor trucks.

The total gross receipts received by the State Motor Department during the past year was in excess of $19,000,000. This amount is over ten per cent of that collected in the entire country. In this department New York State leads all states.

The total increase numerically in motor cars during the past year was 201,920 or 20 per cent.

New York people do not spend all their money for automobile fees or for new cars. With over ten per cent of the population of the country, the people of this state have 25 per cent of the individual deposits in its banks.

These New York people have money for other things. It is the wealthiest community in the world.

The quick way, the easy way and profitable one to sell merchandise of all kinds in New York is to advertise it in the daily newspapers attached below.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

RUBY M. AYRES is writing her 5th consecutive serial for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York. It is called "The Marriage Handicap." Release date has been set for June 30.

RUBY M. AYRES

Miss Ayres' name is really Mrs. Reginald Pocock. She is a born story-teller, and began writing fairy tales as a child. When she was very young, the London Daily Chronicle and the London Daily Mirror began publishing her work.

Since then she has appeared in practically every English newspaper and magazine. In this country her popularity is steadily increasing. Forty newspapers ran one of her recent serials.

"The Littlest Lover," "The Scar," "The Romance of a Rogue," "The Man Without a Heart," "Second-best," "Ribbons and Laces," and "Paul in Possession" are some of her late successes.

R. M. (Bob) Brinkerhoff, cartoonist for the New York World Syndicate, creator of "Little Mary Mix-up," has taken his comic character on a 4 months' trip abroad, sailing from New York, June 3 on the S. S. Republic.

Walt Munson, cartoonist, is drawing a daily two-column comic under the caption "Time to Crab" for the Des Moines Register and Tribune Newspaper Syndicate.

Phyllis Duganne's short story, "Or Leave 'Em Alone" will be released to newspapers June 22, by the Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate, Chicago.

Clinton T. Brainard, president of the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, has gone to his camp in Maine for a vacation.

What the women of movieland are wearing when they are on or off location is the theme of a new feature called "Hollywood Fashions" being released by the Tom Beck Features, Los Angeles.

Stephen Leacock is writing a weekly humorous article for the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York.

George W. Wightman, president of the United States Lawn Tennis Association, has addressed an open letter to the various clubs in the country concerning his interpretation of the player-writer rule, over which so much controversy has arisen, largely because it involves William T. Tilden, 2nd, national champion, who writes for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia. In it, he insists the player-writer is paid for his fame, declaring the distinction makes professionals of stars who write on sport.

George McManus, cartoonist for the King Features Syndicate, New York, creator of "Bringing Up Father," was the guest of the Lancaster (Pa.) News-Journal, May 28. He was introduced to the Lancaster school children and members of the Lions' Club.

Bob Satterfield, cartoonist for the Publishers' Autocaster Service, New York, will cover the political conventions for his syndicate, drawing cartoons of political leaders from the convention floor.

Alexander Johnson, for 12 years editor of Motor, and for 22 years a writer on motor subjects, has contracted with the Christy Walsh Syndicate, New York, to furnish a 600-word article each week, discussing new improvements and practical subjects interesting to automobile owners. The service also includes a Question Box.

Dr. Frank J. Monaghan, Commissioner of Health for New York City, is now writing a series of articles under the caption "Health Habits" for the Christy Walsh Syndicate, New York.

Don Herold, regular contributor to Life, has contracted to write a weekly humorous feature for the McNaught Syndicate, Inc., New York. He will illustrate it himself. Release date has not yet been set, but it is expected it will be the last of this month.

H. C. Witwer has written a series of 11 short stories called "The Rubyiat of a College Man," the first of which will be released June 15, by the King Features Syndicate, New York. They will run Sundays.

Mrs. Helen Searl has joined the traveling staff of the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York.

"Christine of the Hungry Heart" by Kathleen Norris will be released as a serial early in July by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York.

Glenwood Mahar, of the McClure Newspaper Syndicate Sales force who has been out on a two months' trip through the middle west contracted pneumonia and is now in the Mount Carmel Hospital, Columbus, O., where he is reported recovering.

William Jennings Bryan will cover both political conventions for the McNaught Syndicate, Inc., New York. Others who will cover for the same syndicate are Samuel G. Blythe, Rube Goldberg, and Will Rogers.

Charles V. McAdam, vice-president of the McNaught Syndicate, and Ray McCarthy, golf writer, engaged in a foursome recently with Gene Sarazen and Johnny Farrell at the Quaker Ridge Country Club.

Southern Publishers

located in twenty-six of the leading cities of the South with thirty-four of the leading daily newspapers, join in a co-operative effort to induce advertisers and manufacturers to take advantage of the unusual market conditions prevailing throughout Dixie.

The people are long on money and short on merchandise. They need goods of all kinds, and plenty of them.

Business throughout Dixie is as business never was before. It is booming bigger, stronger and more insistent than ever.

These Southern people need machinery. They need household conveniences. They need new and better merchandise of all kinds. They need tractors and all kinds of farming machinery. They need more automobiles.

Notwithstanding the increase in population, the people need labor-saving devices of all kinds not so much to save labor as to increase output.

Business of every kind is more than good. Agriculture which is the big thing in this great out-of-doors has been speeded up and diversified agriculture is increasing.

These newspapers realizing the expansion of this market invite you to come South with your goods.

The market is here, the money is here. With these daily newspapers you will find a welcome, eager buyers and everything that goes to make business a pleasure.

Some items from London, England, that will show how the Advertising and Publishing Men of Great Britain are preparing and building for the Great Advertising Convention in London, in July, 1924.

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

London Office—Hastings House, 10, Norfolk Street, Strand, W. C. 2

British Registrations Commencing:—Intimations as to Registration are being circulated to all concerned, and the methods will be pretty much those followed at American Conventions, adapted and modified where necessary to suit British conditions. Mrs. Bowman, the A. A. C. W. officer in charge of Registration arrangements is expected to arrive in London on July 3, to take charge of the registration details.

Bush House Registration Headquarters:—One point on which British methods of registration will differ from those on your side is that here registration tickets will be sold to British Delegations in advance. This is regarded as a means of specially meeting conditions here, where there are many thousands of advertising men all over the country not actually attached to any Club who will wish to have facilities for attending the Convention. The fact that they don't belong to a club may be explained by the fact that there is probably no club in their district. The Registration Headquarters in London will be at Bush House, Kingsway, the fine piece of architecture that stands with one frontage on the Strand and the other facing down the length of the broad thoroughfare of Kingsway. It is perhaps the finest position in London.

American Delegates Sticking Together:—The arrangements are rapidly taking shape for the allocation of American delegates in bunches to the various London hotels during Convention week. The contingents are being held together according to towns of origin. The New York contingent will divide between 3 fine hotels, the Belgravia (near Victoria Station), and the Metropole, and Victoria (both in Northumberland Avenue, running parallel with the Strand). The Chicagoans will be accommodated at the Grosvenor (near Victoria Station) and the Hyde Park Hotel (about half-mile distant). The Bostonians will divide between the Grand (at Charing Cross) and the Piccadilly (on Piccadilly). Houston will occupy the Imperial Hotel, on Southampton Row, a hundred yards or so from Sentinel House, London Convention headquarters; Los Angeles will be at the Midland Grand, close by the St. Pancras terminal. The members of the American Advertising Agents Association and officials will be situated at the Hotel Cecil, centrally placed in the Strand, and the Pittsburgh contingent at the Hotel Russell, on Southampton Row, a few yards from the Imperial Hotel.

Opera Gala Night for Delegates:—Horace Imber tells me of an opera gala night he is arranging for overseas delegates, on behalf of the proprietor of the London Daily Chronicle. At present it is sufficiently advanced to indicate that it is something entirely different from any other entertainment being provided here, but there will be one pleasant surprise which I must hold for a day or two until the complete details are settled.

Liaison Officers for Delegates:—The desire of our folk here that every delegate shall feel at home and among friends has found expression in a call for liaison officers to act between the various contingents and sections and their British equivalents. This is perhaps even more important in the case of Continental delegates speaking little English, but the response shows the keenness to make our U. S. visitors feel comfortable.

C. Harold Vernon Gives Radio Talk:—At the invitation of the British Broadcasting Company, C. Harold Vernon, on May 21, told the story of the Wembley Convention on the radio. Announcing that the Prince of Wales as patron had consented to open the first session, Mr. Vernon said that our great Advertising Convention would fail if it did not increase the business of this country and make the problem of unemployment less acute. The radio talk was used as a means of getting at those who might, even now, be unaware of the magnitude of the Convention, and I understand it was entirely successful.

A. N. A. A. and I. S. B. A.—By a special Resolution of the Central Executive of the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers, all advertisers eligible for ordinary membership under their rules, visiting this country for the Convention, will on application be enrolled as honorary members of the Society during their stay in Great Britain. They will be entitled to make full use of the services of the organization (for which members pay $100 a year) and to attend all meetings held between July and August of this year, including the Joint Departmental Meetings of the Association of National Advertisers of America and the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers at Wembley. They will also be the guests of the I. S. B. A. at the Banquet of the World's Advertisers at the Connaught Rooms on July 15.

Dutch Advertising Agents Come In:—I understand that the Vereeniging van Erkende Advertentie Bureaux in Nederland, the Dutch Association of Advertising Agents, has requested Mr. Fernand A. Marteau to secure their affiliation to the A. A. C. W. This is the 3rd Dutch and 9th Continental Organization which has joined District No. 14. I am told that two other Dutch Clubs, as well as one Swedish organization, are at present examining the advisability of becoming members.

Advertising Women Establish Contact:—To provide the personal contact with the business women coming from America and other overseas countries for the Advertising Convention, a Correspondence Bureau has been opened, so that the business women of Great Britain may at once get in touch by letter with one or more of the visiting women delegates. Miss McCandlish Smith, of the Publicity Club of London is in charge of the arrangements.

A.A.A.A. Sending 30 to London

About 30 members of the American Association of Advertising Agencies will attend the international A. A. C. W. convention at Wembley Park, London, July 13-18, James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary reported this week. Included in the delegation will be: Stanley Resor, J. Walter Thompson Company, New York; C. D. Newell, Newell-Emmett Company, Inc., New York; Henry B. Humphrey, H. B. Humphrey Company, Boston; Harry Dwight Smith, Fuller & Smith, Cleveland; H. H. Charles, Charles Advertising Service, New York; A. E. Greenleaf, Greenleaf Company, Boston; St. Elmo Massengale, Massengale Advertising Agency, Atlanta, Ga.; Milton Towne, Joseph Richards Company, Inc., New York; H. T. Ewald, Campbell-Ewald Company, New York; M. P. Gould. M. P. Gould Company, New York; William H. Rankin, William H. Rankin Company, New York.

lhers' Refusal to Let Typographi- a Union Dictate New Contract Calls Out Also Mailers and Stereotypers

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ETTLE, Wash., May 31.—In an effort e orce what the Seattle Post-Intel- r management considers "unjusti- l working conditions and an unrea- e high rate of wages," members of pographical, mailers, and stereo- unions employed on that paper yesterday. The action was taken face of the publisher's offer to all issues to arbitration. Non- crews are now working. Objec- so the typographical union's propos- ere cited by the Post-Intelligencer ives as follows:

y completely excluded participa- y the ownership in the conduct of mposing room.

y perpetuated the reproduction law nposing rooms.

y obligated the acceptance of a of rules passed by the local typo- ical union laying down working ions.

y provided that the contract would id if the Post-Intelligencer was le to reach an agreement with any e of its mechanical departments.

y prohibited the transfer of men one part of the composing room to ter, except under work-creating limi- cs.

y made discharge of an employe cally impossible.

y excluded any conditions providing iation on any question under any nstances.

union contract has been signed by ier Seattle office and the union based is its insistence that the Post-Inte- er accept its terms.

der the former contract, which ex- e Dec. 31, 1923, the typographical was $48 day and $51 night for a ur week. The scale proposed by nion for the Post-Intelligencer, a ring paper, called for $51 minimum $58.50 maximum, the bulk of the o receive the latter wage.

Post-Intelligencer indicated that uld agree to higher wages than the ontract provided and to continuance old 42-hour week.

non-union crew was immediately put ork and the newspaper has not d an issue. It reports little loss in ation and no loss in advertising.

hough not specifically stated in the dispatch, the Seattle situation ap- tly involves the first joint action by ailers' union with the typographical to enforce demands by the latter, the law providing for such action d at the last convention of the Inter- nal Typographical Union. The typers' contract expired at the same as did that of the typographical un- nd provided a wage scale of $48 day $51 night for a 44-hour week. The rs' scale, which expired October 1, gave foreman $48 day or night, and eymen $39, day or night, with a 45- week days and 42-hour nights.

Y., administration candidate, d of 3,440 over the progressive date Charles P. Howard, the in- ent, in the contest for president of rganization. The total vote in the ocals was 51,654.

Officials of the union announced June 2, in Indianapolis, that no more figures in the election of international officers would be given out, until the official tabulation is reviewed by the organization's canvassing board which meets there June 7.

According to the unofficial tabulation Seth R. Brown of Los Angeles, in the contest for first vice-president, is leading his opponent, George F. Beach of New York, by more than 2,000 votes, while Austin Hewson of New York has a lead of 4,000 votes over William R. Trotter of Vancouver, B. C., the incumbent, in the race for second vice-president. John W. Hayes of Minneapolis, secretary-treasurer, leads his opponent, William A. Aldrich of Chicago, by 5,000 votes. All in the lead are Administration candidates.

A. P. TO HOLD SPECIAL MEET JULY 31

Members to Vote on Applications of Rochester Times-Union and Baltimore Evening Sun Opposed by Hearst Papers

Associated Press members will hold a special meeting in New York July 31, to vote on the applications for membership of the Rochester (N. Y.) Times-Union and the Baltimore (Md.) Evening Sun.

Call for the meeting was issued this week by Melville E. Stone, secretary, on advice of counsel and by direction of the A. P. executive committee.

Accompanying the call were 5 different proxy forms for members' use. One of the forms entitles members to appoint their own proxy; another appoints Paul Patterson and VanLear Black of the Baltimore Evening Sun, to vote in favor of that newspaper; another appoints Frank E. Tripp, Elmira (N. Y.) Advertiser, and Frank E. Gannett, Rochester Times-Union to vote in favor of the Times-Union; the last two appoint Arthur Brisbane, Baltimore News; Frank A. Munsey, New York Sun; George S. Oliver, Pittsburg Gazette-Times, Robert Ewing, New Orleans States and John Francis Neylan, San Francisco Call and Post to vote against admission to membership.

When these two newspapers applied for membership at the April convention of the Associated Press, their applications were opposed in the case of the Evening Sun by Arthur Brisbane, A. P., member for the Baltimore News, and Harry Gray, member for the Rochester (N. Y.) Journal and Post-Express. Both opposing newspapers are owned by William Randolph Hearst.

The applications had been automatically passed from the A. P. board of directors to the members attending the convention by reason of the protests. They missed to obtain A. P. memberships over the protests by the narrow margin of but 3 votes. Results of the July 31, vote will govern future action in similar cases.

According to the present by-laws of the Associated Press a four-fifths vote of all present at an annual meeting is needed to override the protest which was vested in the membership of old members in the organization. Both the Baltimore News and the Rochester Post-Express hold such protest rights.

Portland Business Bureau Wins

Portland (Ore.) Better Business Bureau was awarded the trophy for the most constructive work during the past year at the convention of the Pacific Coast Advertising Clubs Association held May 25-28 in Fresno. The Bureau is managed by Kenneth Hood. The trophy was a sterling silver shield.

Newark Ledger Opens N. Y. Office

The Newark (N. J.) Ledger, the only morning newspaper published in Newark, on June 2, opened their own office in New York in the Marbridge Building, 47 West 34th street. John Davidson Lane is manager.

SOME FACTS ABOUT AGRICULTURE IN

West Virginia

This state is basically a farming and fruit growing state, notwithstanding its leadership among the mineral and timber states.

West Virginia has 5,554,731 fruit bearing apple trees and 2,049,862 fruit bearing peach trees.

It ranks among the first twelve in peach growing and is one of the first nine in apple growing.

West Virginia ranks first in the United States in percentage of farm lands free from mortgage, having 73 per cent clear of debt.

The farmers are 98.6 per cent American born. This is the highest per cent of native-born farmers to be found in any state in the Union.

The sale of dairy products in this state amounts to approximately $12,000,000.

West Virginia's poultry and eggs are worth $15,000,000 each year.

Buyers of space would do well to study West Virginia. Learn the facts about her mines, her farms, her factories and her 1,463,701 people.

You can be a big advertiser among these prosperous people by a comparatively small expenditure in daily newspaper advertising.

The following list of daily West Virginia newspapers cover this territory and sell merchandise.

They offer to discriminating advertisers the least expensive and most effective method of making their trade-mark a greater asset.

N.E.A. QUITS TEXAS FOR MEXICAN TOUR

San Antonio Express Tenders Banquet to Delegates—Odell and Hotaling Given Watches—Ad Handicaps Decreasing

SAN ANTONIO, Tex., May 30.—Thirty states were represented at a banquet given by the Express Publishing Company May 27, to the National Editorial Association delegation enroute to Mexico. Following the banquet the party of more than 200 left for Laredo where they crossed into Mexico.

At the banquet Wilson M. Smith of the Waverly (Ill.) Journal presented, on behalf of the Association a gold watch to President Wallace Odell of the Tarrytown (N. Y.) News. Mrs. Odell was given a leather purse.

A watch and purse were also presented to Executive Secretary H. C. Hotaling and wife, of St. Paul. The presentation was made by John P. Herrick, Olean (N. Y.) Breeze.

M. M. Harris, editor of the San Antonio Express and News, as toastmaster, introduced President F. G. Huntress of the Express Publishing Company, who welcomed the visitors. Mr. Odell responded. D. D. Moore, publisher of the Fort Worth Record and acting director of William Randolph Hearst's San Antonio Light, spoke of the prosperity of Texas newspapers. S. D. Chestnutt, past-president, Texas Press Association welcomed the visitors for that organization.

During a sightseeing tour of San Antonio Tuesday the editors stood before the Alamo and heard the history of that Shrine of Texas freedom. Among other places visited, under chaperonage of Ralph Durkee, publicity representative of the Chamber of Commerce, was Brooksfield, where two newspaper girls, Misses Mildred and Elizabeth Zerbey, Pottsville, Pa., were the first to enjoy the thrill of an airplane ride.

The editors underwent vaccination in anticipation of the Mexico trip before they left Oklahoma City.

In a report of the advertising committee of the N. E. A. presented at Oklahoma City it was indicated that handicaps which have operated to prevent the advertising agency from using the country weekly are gradually being removed.

The committee noted with gratification "the steps taken in different states to remove the handicaps," including:

1. Impressing the publisher with the necessity of issuing a rate card of standard form.
2. Standardizing rates, using the N. E. A. scale as a guide.
3. Getting publishers to equip their plants so that mats can be used.

The improvement in this respect the past year has been referred to as a "revolutionary development in the country newspaper field" by James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary of the American Association of Advertising Agencies. Three state press associations have announced that arrangements have been perfected so that mats can be handled for every country weekly if necessary.

4. Compiling state lists through the office of a secretary or committee and furnishing advertisers and agencies with rate books giving essential information regarding every paper whose publisher is progressive enough to supply it.

"Such information is furnished to advertisers and agencies for daily newspapers, magazines, farm papers and all trade publications. A similar directory covering the country newspapers is sorely needed and would be welcomed by advertisers and agencies," the report stated.

Members of the N. E. A. advertising committee were Herman Roe, Northfield, Minn.; Harry B. Potter, Marshall, Ill., and T. H. Alvord, Livonia, N. Y.

"SUNPAPERS" EXPAND

Buy Additional Property to Facilitate Delivery Department

BALTIMORE, June 5.—The A. S. Abell Company, publishers of the Sun and the Evening Sun, have just purchased Numbers 4 and 6 West Redwood street, adjoining the rear of the company's building on the west and connecting with the property acquired 2 years ago, when 9 and 11 West Baltimore street were purchased.

The A. S. Abell Company buildings now have a combined frontage of 84 feet on Baltimore street, the main business thoroughfare of Baltimore, and of 89½ feet on Redwood street, as well as a frontage of 203 feet on Charles street, the chief north and south artery of business Baltimore.

One immediate effect of the purchase will be to give the "Sunpapers" room very much needed for the delivery departments, and for preparing the papers for mailing and for loading.

The new properties will also provide room for the expansion of press room, stereotyping department, composing room and other departments for some years.

Rankin Names Tea Essay Winners

"POCKET VETO" SEEN FOR POSTAL WAGE BILL

Will Die With Close of Congress is Belief—Publishers Continue Opposition—P. O. Dept. Determine Mail Costs

BY SAM BELL

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 4.—A "pocket veto" of Post Office salary bill, which will cost the Government an annual increase in postal expenditures ranging from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000 is expected of President Coolidge. His opposition to the measure is well known and in it he is supported by Postmaster General New, who believes that pay increases for postal employes should await the ascertainment of the cost of handling the various class of mail, now being undertaken by the Post Office.

The attitude of the publishing interests upon the pending measure, which has passed both Senate and House in slightly different form, was made known to Mr. Coolidge last Tuesday when a delegation headed by A. C. Pearson of the American Publishers' Conference called at White House. The President was presented with a copy of the resolutions adopted by National Editorial Association and other organizations which urge determination of the mail cost before any legislation is approved. Publishers realize approval of the pay increases means an increase in postal rates in the near future and Postmaster General Ne estimated that the second class rat ready far too high, will have t their share of the advance. Mr. has estimated the amount of increa will have to be borne by second matter will total $5,000,000 annua Adjustment of salaries in certain ties where the cost of living ha stripped wage advances to posta ployes—a plan evolved by the Post General—was suggested to the Pr by the publishers' representatives.

Complaint was made at the recent meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors that the cost of selling newspaper features was a considerable element in the price of this portion of the newspaper's expense.

The copy service which the Church Advertising Department offers newspapers is loaded with no personal selling expense. This weekly announcement in EDITOR AND PUBLISHER is our only way to reach newspaper advertising managers—and this space is donated by the paper.

Our only desire in life is to see churches make larger use of various forms of helpful publicity. We believe that they can use newspapers largely and that newspapers can show the churches the way this advertising can best be done.

The price for exclusive use of copy averages four dimes a week. We have other copy which is free to all papers.

HEARST PURCHASE OF SENTINEL CONFIRMED

Evening Edition Merged in Wisconsin News, Hearst's Telegram Joined With Its Sunday, It Now Finds New Owner

William Randolph Hearst has purchased the Milwaukee Sentinel. He now owns the only morning newspaper published in Milwaukee.

The evening edition of the Sentinel has been merged with the Wisconsin News. The morning and Sunday editions will be continued.

For a week up to June 5, it was generally believed that it had passed to W. R. Hearst. The latter said nothing. Charles Pfister, owner of the Sentinel for over 20 years, was equally taciturn.

May 29 saw announcements that the Evening Sentinel would be merged with the Wisconsin News, Mr. Hearst's evening paper, and the Sunday Sentinel with Mr. Hearst's Milwaukee Telegram. Staffs of the morning and evening Sentinel were combined and the morning and Sunday issues were produced under direction of Julius Liebman, Sentinel managing editor, with Richard Gardner, managing editor of the Sunday Telegram, assigned to the Sentinel in an advisory capacity. The evening title was called "Wisconsin News & Evening Sentinel"; the Sunday name was "Sunday Sentinel & Milwaukee Telegram." The morning paper title remained Sentinel.

Rumors then arose that Mr. Hearst had not purchased the property. EDITOR & PUBLISHER asked Mr. Pfister to state the facts. The following telegram resulted:

"Answering your telegram to Mr. Pfister, in his absence. The Sentinel this morning announced that Judge August C. Backus had acquired control and was now its publisher. The Evening Sentinel was merged with the Wisconsin News. This was done in part to secure control of the Sunday Telegram.

RADIO'S TRIBUTE WITH PRESS I. C. M. A. HEARS

Mr. Pearson gave details of the 300 per cent increase in postal rates brought about by the war revenue measure and never reduced, and illustrated how large publishers were saving distribution expense by multiple second-class entries and private mailing.

An open discussion was held on the question of baseball extras, however, and it developed that most managers do not look upon them kindly and that they have been discontinued by a number of papers.

Mr. Sweeney explained the plan of collections used by the Free Press which virtually takes the newsboy into the business, opens a savings account for him with the paper and pays 5 per cent interest. The carriers deposit all of the money to this account from which the price of the papers is deducted and interest paid on the balance. The carrier is permitted to make additional deposits or draw from the account any time he desires, with the consent of his parents, who are also taken into the plan, and who, Mr. Sweeney says, are always strongly in favor of it.

Mr. Lincoln pointed out that it is as necessary for a newspaper to advertise as for any other business; that the use of bill-boards and novelties is about the only way for a paper to let persons who do not read the paper know what they have for sale.

Other speakers at the session were William Coonradt, Decatur Review, on "Methods of Procedure in Changing from Office Owned to Independent Carrier System"; John Schmid, Indianapolis News, on "Possibilities for Circulation on Rural Routes by Afternoon Newspapers," and Sidney D. Long, Wichita Eagle, on the "Future of Mail Subscriptions if Postal Rates Are not Reduced. How Much More Will It Cost the Rural Route Patron to Take a Daily Metropolitan Newspaper."

Mr. Schmid pointed out in his address that the News now has 60 routes, averaging 40 miles each in length that are covered by autos and trucks. The theory of delivery afternoon papers in the rural districts by this method is all right, he said, but the expense is heavy.

"We started out during the railroad strike and the miners strike, by picking out all of the good roads that are passable the year around," said Mr. Schmid. "We figure each route at about 40 miles and allow two and one half hours to cover it. If we can get two houses to the mile to start with, we are more than satisfied. We intended to cover these routes with motorcycles and side-cars, but during the railroad strike we started out by using trucks because with them we could make our deliveries to agent, and we have stuck to that system ever since. We now have men on many of these routes who use their own cars and make their own collections. We pay them 4½ cents a mile and $1.50 a day, which makes the average man earn around $18 a week on a 40 mile route. The cost is three times as much as rural circulation, but it enables us to deliver the same edition to the country as in the city."

"The future of the mail subscriptions if postal rates are not reduced depends on the amount of money the publisher is willing to spend on the R. F. D.," said Mr. Long. "The rural free delivery subscriber is the most expensive one we have. It is necessary to maintain a mailing list for him, put his name on the paper, etc., and on top of all of this, it is much more expensive to secure his subscription. I feel that unless the price of paper and postage is cut, the only thing to do with the rural subscriber is to figure out a cost system and charge him accordingly. It costs so much more to deliver the paper to the farmer, and he should be made to pay that cost. Newspapers have always sold the farm the paper at the lowest possible price, although during the war, papers learned to charge nearer what it cost to produce them instead of charging just what their competitors would let them charge. The farmer is demanding better news. He is demanding the same news as the city subscriber, and should be willing to pay for it."

In the discussion which followed, Mr. Schmid gave figures to show the amount the News loses each year on every rural subscriber. He figured that the paper averaged 40 pages per day for 312 days a year and that each subscriber received 208 pounds of newspaper a year. The white paper cost 4 cents a pound and postage cost 2 cents a pound, making a total cost of $12.48, to which he added 15 pounds of ink at 5 cents a pound, making a total of $13.23. The News receives $4 a year for rural subscriptions and $2 commissions for securing the subscriptions, leaving $2 against a cost of $13.23, or a loss of $11.23 on each subscriber. This does not take into consideration the cost of handling in the mailing room, the cost of the news services in the paper or other production costs.

Speakers at the closing session were George Erb Jr., Buffalo News, on "The best method of canvass, house to house in country towns"; Oscar McPeak, Rome News, on "In cities of 20,000 and under should carriers be independent or salaried, and which method will return greater net revenue"; William Elder, Toronto Telegram, on "Unaccounted for copies, what is fair percentage," and Paul Sergent, Louisville Herald-Post, on the general differences in the organization and operation of a circulation department in a city of 100,000 and 1,000,000 or over.

Mr. Elder advised a check on the press room and a check on the free distribution to cut down the number of unaccounted for copies.

D. G. B. Rose, of the Standard Printing Company, also delivered a short talk after the election of officers, in which he dwelt on the organization of the association 26 years ago and pointed to its growth from a mere handful of members at that time to the present membership of more than 700.

Many of the delegates left for their homes immediately after the close of the convention, while a number remained to take a trip to Mammoth Cave in a special train chartered for the occasion.

SHORT hair, all beauty parlor managers claim, has at least doubled the amount of money taken in by their departments. Yet they don't advertise half as much as they should. Get after your local beauty parlor and the barber shops which specialize in bobbing.

We've mentioned it before, but it's worth repeating:

Marshall Field & Co., wholesale, in their May issue of Field Quality News, draw attention to the fact that inasmuch as it is a presidential election year, there will be a heavy demand for flags.

Get your share of the flag ads.

And then—June weddings!

How about a double-truck advertisement on the theme: "Furnishing the Bride's House?"

Begin with:

Luscious negligees, laces, and chiffons for the trousseu.

The Bridal gown and wreath for the wedding day.

Then:

Beds—Twin or single Furniture
Kitchen utensils
Rugs
China
Silverware

And could a bride be happy without a photographer ready to take her picture?

There's another double-truck ad just waiting to be built devoted to sports: It might run under the streamer question "Are You Ready for the Game?"

It would contain ads for:

Flannel suits for women golfers
Knickers for men
Wool stockings
White trousers
Negligee shirts
Golf clubs
Golf bags
Tennis racquets and balls
Baseball paraphernalia
Riding habits.

MANY newspapers carry the weather forecast in a "box" on the front page. As a special service or as a service at special rates to regular advertisers a box of similar size could be utilized next to the weather forecast for pertinent commercial information of interest because of the weather that is due. Thus, raincoats, umbrellas and rubbers would be the subjects of price quotations on days when rain is predicted and automobile horns and headlights might be mentioned in the prominently displayed box when foggy weather is in the forecast.—David Resnick, St. Louis Times.

What territory do the reporters for your paper cover in going after news? It would make an interesting feature for the paper if you would prepare maps showing the routes regularly taken by your reporters in going after news and if you would then run these maps in your paper in connection with a story telling about the great lengths to which you go in getting news.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

The "Mail Order Parcel Post" section of the Halifax Herald was quite well taken up with advertisements of various firms of the city. This was a Weekly Mail Order Catalogue by which people out of the city could order through city stores and enjoy the privilege of the "Where-Can-I-Buy Service." — V. G. Dawson, Halifax.

How many shoe repair companies have you? Are you getting their advertising? Here's the reason I'm asking. A middle West paper came out with a page headed "The Story of the Old Shoe—Down and Out Today, In Service Tomorrow."

"—THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS A WORN-OUT SHOE THESE DAYS—FACT. For if there is a bit of leather left the skillful shoe repair man can build a new shoe around it that will once more serve and serve well the purpose that was originally intended.

"In the days of old when a pair of shoes lost its sole few indeed ever took the pains to have a new sole added to what was left of the original shoe—but in these days of skillful repair work it is the exception indeed that does not have as many pairs of soles put on the original shoes as the uppers will stand—and it is not the higher price of shoes that is responsible for the change, but rather that the public has learned that the old shoe with a new sole is better than breaking in a new pair," etc..

The followed a brief paragraph about 9 shoe repair men whose display ads occupied the remainder of the page. This idea should sell easily in a city of any size. Remember these fellows are not "solicited to death" for ads and will find it hard to turn this idea down when they see it in cold type.—George C. Marclay, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

The Fort Wayne (Ind.) Journal-Gazette runs a quarter page ad every now and then in which most of the local automobile dealers give the delivered prices of the new cars they are handling, in all models. This little department is, of course, of great interest to all the folks in the city who are at all interested in purchasing new cars. And, of course, it is a very easy matter to secure plenty of advertising for this department.—Frank H. Williams, Santa Ana, Cal.

A novel dollar puller was used by the Ypsilanti (Mich.) Daily Press in connection with the recent Dollar Day put on by the local merchants. For any one who paid a dollar or more on their subscription Dollar Day the Press ran a classified advertisement under any classification 3 insertions free. This applied to any advertisement up to 25 words. There was, of course, a time limit as to when the ads could be run. Following the offer the Press printed various suggestions for the use of want ads. Why not try out something similar? It not only brings in a good many dollars of subscription money but also calls attention to the efficacy of want ads, for many of those who take advantage of such an offer will be those who have never before used the want ads at all.—Cyril E. Lamb, Ypsilanti, Mich.

Originality in bank advertising in small cities and towns will stimulate a desire for buying more space on the part of the bankers. One Washington state weekly is carrying a series of novel ads for a local bank by helping the banker tie-in with the movement for diversification in crops. Little stories of successful farmers who keep the dollars rolling in with barnyard flocks of hens or a few extra hogs to rid the place of waste grain, etc., and the part these side-lines have played in making them successful are used weekly in a display ad.—A. N.

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

NOTHING exerts a greater influence on modern life than the daily newspaper. For that reason I have long urged that some attention be paid to the press in the high schools of the country. Every year about this time students are graduated without any ability to distinguish news of permanent value from that of any passing interest. Yet the newspaper is the post-graduate course to study not only for most of these students, but also for their parents. Consequently the pamphlet, "How to Read the New York Times" ought—to use a very much overworked expression—fill a long felt want.

This pamphlet opens with the question, "What do you get out of your newspaper?" After answering this question with "The news, of course" it asks a more important one:

> But do you get out of it also—> knowledge of current history, > clear picture of the course of great events, > multitude of suggestions for building up your information,
> stimulus to thought,
> method of arriving at sound judgments—
> In short, does your newspaper contribute fully to your education?

In order that the reader may know what a newspaper really is the following comment is offered:

> The true newspaper is a thing not only of Today but also of Yesterday and Tomorrow; not an isolated record but a vital part of the continuous story of mankind; not a passing chronicle that dies almost before the ink is dry on its pages but a chapter of world history that must be read in the light of what has gone before and of what is likely to come after. Through its columns run the vast currents of life and the sweeping tides of events.

After this explanation of what a newspaper really is, the author of the pamphlet—my guess is that he is Lester Markel, Sunday editor,—then makes a survey of the Times for the month of December, 1923, and shows how a half-dozen outstanding news events are developed in those 31 days.

Obviously the author insists that the newspaper reader should study carefully and thoughtfully the news and not merely scan the headlines. To do this he suggests that the reader ask such questions as these:

> What is the background of the present event in the happenings that have led up to it and the causes behind it? Who are the outstanding personalities concerned and what do they represent? Are there historic parallels for this event? What are the political, the social and the economic conditions that must be taken into consideration?

Answers to these questions will give the reader information, will stimulate reflection, and will enable him to arrive at sound judgment.

To prove his points the author selected the Times for December 28, 1923—said to be an average issue because it contained no sensational news, but merely gave a clear picture of what the newspaper daily prints. Eleven news stories of permanent interest were selected by way of illustration. In each instance the original headline was reprinted.

The author insists that this statement should be underscored, "Advertising is news and vital news." To some the following may seem somewhat startling:

> The budget of news included each day in the advertising columns of the Times is sufficient to make a good-sized newspaper; certainly without it the journal is not complete. It might almost be said that the newspaper with the greatest amount of advertising carries the greatest amount of news.

The author insists that because advertising is news it can be analyzed and studied as profitably as the text columns. Four examples are given:

> From the "Help and Position Wanted" columns you can gauge the state of the labor market.
> From the department store advertisements you can judge the trend of prices.
> From the real estate columns you can compile an index to the housing situation.
> From the financial and business advertisements you can make an analysis of economic conditions.

In conclusion the author offers six suggestions by way of summary.

From this pamphlet the editorial writer can obtain excellent material for an editorial on "How to Read a Newspaper." The publisher might well consider the advisability of printing a similar booklet for his readers. Strange as it may seem the newspaper sadly needs a good press agent.

TO the Forum for May, Norman Thomas contributed "Labor and the Press." For about 10 pages he tells the story of recent labor newspapers and makes some attempt to explain why they have not achieved success. Such newspapers in the opinion of Mr. Thomas have been usually dry bulletins or monuments to dullness—sometimes both. Mr. Thomas has had so much experience on papers of this sort that he ought to speak with a certain degree of authority.

THAT newspaper classic, "Deadline," by Henry Justin Smith, news editor of the Chicago Daily News (Covici-McGee) made Josslyn so familiar to newspaper people that they will be glad to know that Mr. Smith has just given him a book all to himself. The new volume "Josslyn" will be reviewed more in detail in a later issue.

Governor Addresses Press Club

More than 500 persons attended the "historical night" program of the Baltimore Press Club, May 27, at which Governor Ritchie of Maryland was chief speaker. The occasion of the program was the commemoration of 3 events: the sending of the first telegraphic message from Washington to Baltimore, May 27, 1844; the first issue of the Baltimore American and Daily Advertiser in 1773; and the first issue of the Baltimore Sun in 1837. Charles Seldon of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad discussed the history of the telegraph; E. B. Redman, the life of the American, and Judge T. J. C. Williams, who presided, spoke of the career of the Sun. Visiting speakers included Senators Edward I. Edwards, New Jersey; Walter F. George, Georgia; and John W. Harreld, Oklahoma. The success of the affair was due to the efforts of Edward H. Pfund, executive secretary.

Ogden Reid Returns from France

Ogden Reid, editor of the New York Herald Tribune, with Howard Davis, business manager, and Harold Cross, counsel for the newspaper, returned to New York from Paris this week, where they have been attending to details regarding reorganization of the Paris Herald Tribune, English language newspaper, included in the sale of the New York Herald by Frank Munsey. The name of Lawrence Hills is now carried on the Paris paper's masthead as editor and general manager instead of Frank Munsey. No changes in personnel were made. Davis reports the French newspaper has been increased in size from 6 to 8 pages, and that it is now averaging 25 columns of advertising a day.

He declares the mechanical equipment was in splendid shape. It includes two 3-deck Goss presses, capable of printing 12 pages at capacity.

SOLDIERS' bonus stories these days are dealing mostly with explanations of the act and instructions on filing claims. Local insurance companies differ in opinions as to whether the bonus hinders or helps them. Advertising from them along with the story ought to finish an interesting page any day now.—C. A. Grimes, Central Falls, R. I.

"How are the Roads?" is the caption of a front page box of an Iowa paper carried daily. Only high lights are carried on road conditions. It proves of great help to motorists.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal,

"Who Makes the Stars?" Sporting writers can ask fans this question in their columns and then answer it themselves. The newspaper makes the stars—the athletic kind. Without newspapers, nine-tenths of the stars would not be known. The encouragement of sport writers has helped athletes to give their best, because they wanted good write-ups. Sport writers can localize this feature by naming stars in their territory, made or discovered by their paper. Of course, there is bound to be some criticism on the feature, but those who criticize, mean interested readers.—Abe Smith, Marietta, O.

Next time news fails to come as it ought, send a man out to interview the city clerk. City clerks are human, meet all kinds of people, hear all kinds of things, and have all kinds of hobbies. One I know used to have a reputation as a boxer. Another is quite a literary sharp. The interview should be good for a column or a column and a half.—William G. Colgate, Montreal.

Recently a San Francisco paper offered liberal rewards for the best set of rules on "How to Be Happy Though Married." Answers came from spinsters, bachelors, and a great many married men and women. A committee of well-known men and women picked the winning replies. These were printed, together with pictures of the authors. The idea stirred up wide interest and much discussion in and around San Francisco.—Buford O. Brown, Stanford University, Cal.

"The Future of Radio" can be "decided" in short letters from your readers. Nominal prizes of a few dollars for the best letters can be given. This serves to brighten the radio page; as such a contest created much interest in the Washington (D. C.) News. — C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

The season for the garden variety of "whoppers" is here. Real, for-sure gardeners are in the class with the "proud papa" and the fisherman when it comes to story telling. Urge your readers to report the first "mess of lettuce," the largest number and the most pounds of tomatoes on one vine, and so on. If you can stir up some competition you'll have a lot of fun.—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus (Ind.) Republican.

There's a keeper of a zoo who has been through many a thrilling experience. He probably has narrowly escaped death more than once, yet sticks with the work because he loves animals. There is a story here which will appeal to the fondness people have for both thrills and animals.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

Perhaps the reason why so many modern brides keep their positions after marriage may be found in the fact that the well known marital promise to endow one's bride with one's worldly goods sounds all right but doesn't mean anything. At least that was the contention of the Rev. Frank D. Sheets, addressing a ministers' meeting in Chicago. It made a good story from several angles.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

Try this one to pep up your country correspondents. Pick out a number of instances that have occurred within recent weeks where correspondents have given unusually good service in the way of reporting important news stories promptly. Use these in a circular letter, to be sent to all correspondents. Make the letter a regular affair, about once each a month, atfer you start it. Those whose names appear in this monthly letter will be proud of the fact and strive to have their names appear again. The instances will stimulate others towards better work and show to them the importance of making the reports promptly.—Lewis Hyman, Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

A story may not be amiss at the beginning of the month on the number of commutation tickets issued from the railroad station. In Yonkers, N. Y., more than 900 commutation tickets are sold monthly to New York City and to points north. No doubt many other cities and towns are in the same position as Yonkers and such an item handled in the right way will make good reading. It will pave the way for a feature story dealing with the growth of the number of passengers traveling to business if figures can be secured from the railroad officials.—Thomas F. Kelly, Jr., Yonkers (N. Y.) Statesman.

U. S. PRINTING COSTS HIGH

Carter Gives Estimate for Publishing 50,000,000 Pamphlets

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 4.—A sidelight on the cost of printing the heavy output of government documents was given in the Senate this week when Senator Arthur Capper of Kansas, himself a publisher, sought passage of a resolution to print 50,000,000 copies of "The Peril of Narcotics,—a Warning to the People of America" issued by the International Narcotics Education Association. The Capper proposal was for 25,000,000 copies to be distributed by the Senate and an equal number by the House.

"The printing of 50,000,000 copies of the document," reported George H. Carter, Public Printer, when asked for information by Senator Moses of New Hampshire, "on newsprint paper would cost $161,001.24 and on machine finish paper $183,771.24. In addition to this printing cost 50,000,000 envelopes for mailing will cost $147,539.95. The printing of this number of copies will require the operation of one web press for 250 days, running 8 hours a day. With the vast amount of important work ahead the Printing Office cannot place more than one press on the job. The printing of 50,000,000 copies will require 885,000 pounds of paper, equalling 20 carloads."

News Agencies to Cover Olympics

Newspapers of the United States apparently intend to depend upon press associations and their own European bureaus to cover the Olympic Games this year. When the liner S. S. America, chartered by the Olympic Committee to carry 400 American athletes to the contests, sails for abroad June 16, she will carry only 3 American sports writers. They are: Alan Gould, sporting editor, Associated Press; David J. Walsh, sporting editor, International News Service; and John Hallahan, sporting editor of the Boston Globe. Henry Farrell, sporting editor of the United Press Associations, sailed this week to cover the Wimbledon tennis matches.

What Editors Say About the C.P.A.

THE letter files of the Consolidated Press Association are full of commendation from satisfied editors and publishers. Here is what Moses Strauss, Managing Editor of the Cincinnati Times-Star, wrote this week:

"It is only about a year now, that we began to take your full service. This paper has watched your service with especial attention, as we have the Associated Press and a number of other auxiliary and special services. I believe that it has proved a matter of great gratification to our readers, as an auxiliary service to the Associated Press. It has been found not only free from the color of anyone's opinions, or that of any organization or movement, but remarkably prompt. It has been a delight for our Telegraph Editor to handle, because of its clean copy and because the reader's interest seemed to be continually in mind. The early hour of starting and the continuity of the service have been just what this paper needed.

"I ascribe no little of the increased prestige of the Times-Star to the Chicago Daily News cables in your service. Incidentally, we have often gotten material for display headlines out of what was sent by you, in pursuance of your policy as an auxiliary to the Associated Press. Your other departments are valuable also. I like your financial service for its comprehensiveness and its extended detail, which, naturally, is greater than that of more general services whose wires would be clogged by trying to give every detail in all departments. Your experts have the human touch, and I like their market resume and forecast for our readers."

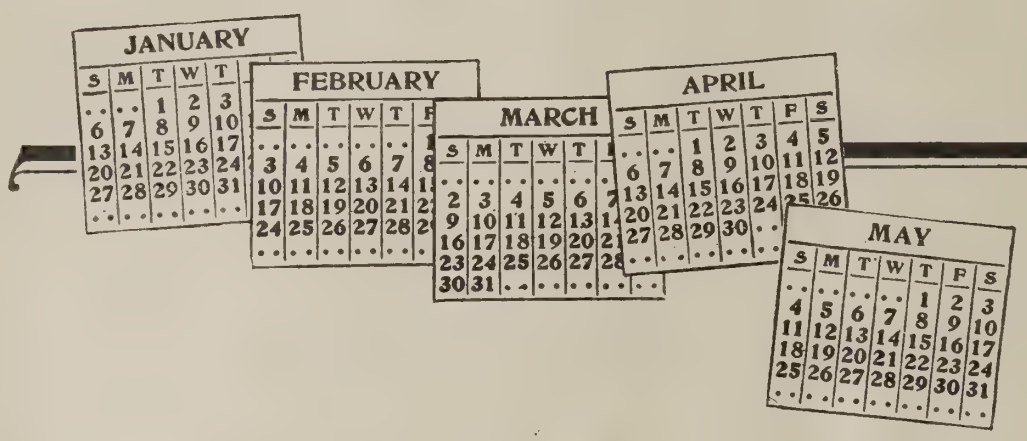
The Tail Does Not Wag the Dog

"If I had some Milk I could have some Mush, if I had some Meal"—that is the predicament of the advertiser who buys merchandising service and gets nothing else with it—and can't cash in on the merchandising service.

Substantially it is buying merchandise to obtain a whistle.



The result-getting factors of merchandising service are right relations with dealers, a record of fair dealing and downright advertising effectiveness that makes business for dealer and advertiser alike. The dealer must profit. Before he stocks merchandise he must know that it is backed by advertising that will move it.

The Chicago Daily News provides a highly efficient merchandising service for its advertisers, adapted to their purpose. The dealer's co-operation is enlisted upon a basis of good business and the basis of this good business is advertising in

It won't cover him!

You can't blanket the United States with a magazine or a few magazines. This is particularly true of the South. Many advertisers do not realize that a great group of all-American people, comprising some 20,000,000, cannot be covered with a magazine having, say, less than 200,000 circulation in ten great states. The way to reach the Southern people is through the Southern newspapers.

The Southern Newspaper Is The Paramount Influence in the South

In the South the people take their newspapers more seriously. They do not read them in the street cars and throw them away. They do not go out on the streets at various hours of the day and buy numerous editions, looking at the comics one time and the market news another time; and throw them in a trash pile. In the South the newspaper is an institution; it goes into the home and is part of the daily lives of the people. A Southern man swears by his newspaper. In the Southern States the advertisers can find the greatest group of all-American people, that is, people of American extraction, people whose ancestors have been in this country for one hundred years or more. With the same ideas, the same social customs and the same institutions, they live alike, vote alike and buy alike. An advertiser ought to take advantage of this fact and reach the great Southern market in the best and most efficient way.

There Is No Business Depression Here

Plan your Fall campaign now. The South is the most prosperous part of the country. Statistics and business figures prove it. While it is agricultural—yet, with mineral resources, lumber and manufacturing interests so diversified—these states report little unemployment and brisk business.

For over a year cotton has sold around 30c a pound or more. This means prosperity and plenty of money in circulation south of the Mason and Dixon Line.

The number of automobiles has doubled in the South, for the past two or three years; and the miles of improved roads have increased four or five times.

Enterprising manufacturers are reaping their reward by going after business in the Southern states. Plan an intensified selling and advertising drive in the South. Write Mr. Walter Johnson, Secretary of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association, Chattanooga, Tenn., or to any of the following papers:

In Interview Hearst Speaks Plainly of Policies of His Organization

Has No Plan for Given Number of Papers—Buys When Others Want to Sell, If He Sees Success Ahead—"No Menacing Monopoly"—Public Benefits From Progressive Newspapers—World's Greatest Newspaper Proprietor Freely Discusses Many Vital Questions in Journalism

Copyright, 1924, by EDITOR & PUBLISHER

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, in an extraordinary interview exclusively granted to EDITOR AND PUBLISHER this week, clearly revealed his opinion and policy on vital questions in journalism.

Following his custom in recent years Mr. Hearst chose to prepare textual replies to a series of formal questions. EDITOR AND PUBLISHER prepared 15 questions, specifying that Mr. Hearst might feel free to disregard any one of them. He answered them all, dictating his replies to his secretary.

"Is it true that your intention is to possess one hundred newspapers in the United States?" was the first question asked.

Mr. Hearst said: "I have no intention to possess any given number of newspapers nor any plan to possess any more newspapers or to take on any more work or trouble.

"But occasionally somebody wants to get rid of a paper and tries to sell it to me, and if I think I can see a way to make it a success, I am very likely to take over the job and try out my program."

(2) "Granted that you believe in your own editorial policies, still as a citizen do you believe that it is good public policy for one mortal man to possess the great power that is inherent in the control of so many newspapers?"

Mr. Hearst said: "In the first place, I have not 'so many newspapers.' There are twenty-five hundred newspapers in the United States, and I have twenty-three newspapers. No very menacing monopoly in that proportion, I should say.

"In the second place there are ten times as many newspapers as I possess, owned by reactionary and predatory interests that endeavor to use them in their schemes to exploit the public.

"And, therefore, it is not only not dangerous but exceedingly beneficial from a public viewpoint to have a few groups of newspapers like the Scripps-Howard papers and mine, owned and operated in support of progressive policies, and to protect the public's property and privileges.

"In the third place, no newspaper has power for long if it misuse it—which is the saving situation in the possession of newspapers by public exploiters; and perhaps, too, with respect to any individuals or interests.

"We all know many cases where policies and nominees have failed of public approval although every newspaper in the community supported them, or have secured public approval although every newspaper opposed them.

"The American people are an independently thinking people.

"Newspapers do not form the opinion of the public; but if they are to be successful, they must express the opinion of the public."

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST

"The assumption that I cannot find able men in a community to conduct a newspaper as well as I would if I were on the ground is a piece of stupid conceit of which I am not guilty.

"I organize our papers with the best men available in a community and they consult me in general matters, but endeavor to carry out the desires of the community in all community matters.

"In addition I generally have a local advisory board of leading citizens to help the local publisher to obtain accurate information in regard to local requirements and sentiments.

"The whole purpose of our papers is to serve loyally the communities in which they are respectively published; and the papers are united into one large organization only to make that service more effective."

(4) "When you buy a newspaper, what do you pay for? Mr. Munsey says he does not pay for circulation, but character."

"I pay for opportunity. The character and circulation of a paper are what you make them. The opportunity is determined by the field and the relative excellence of the competing newspapers."

(5) What must a newspaper yield, from its business and from its editorial departments, to meet your minimum requirements?

"I have no minimum or maximum requirements. I expect a newspaper to make as much profit as is compatible with giving the public a good newspaper, and making subscribers and advertisers feel that they are getting a full return for their money in excellence and service.

"I spend a lot of money in making my newspapers. As a matter of fact I put back into the making of my newspapers over ninety percent of the money these newspapers take in from subscribers and advertisers. This I think I ought to do in order to give adequate service."

(6) "What is the capital value of a regular subscriber?"

"I do not know. I do not think you can estimate the value of a satisfied subscriber merely in terms of money."

(7) "How do you define the power of a newspaper which reaches from twenty-five to fifty percent of the population of a first-class American city, and to what extent have newspaper editors and advertisers exercised this power?"

"The power of a newspaper depends not merely upon the number of its readers, but upon the confidence its readers repose in it. That confidence is earned by intelligent and unselfish service—by a long record of effort for the public good as the editor sees it.

"The power of a newspaper which has deserved and won the confidence of its readers is considerable; but the American people do not follow blindly the lead of any newspaper, even though they may entirely respect its motives."

(8) "Is the political influence of the American press, in general, declining or increasing, and why?"

"I rather think that the influence of the American press is on the whole declining. This, I believe, is because so many newspapers are owned or influenced by reactionary interests and predatory corporations, and are used selfishly, to promote the welfare of these reactionary interests, rather than the welfare of the public.

"This tends to weaken the confidence of the public in all newspapers more or less.

"Furthermore there are other agencies of publicity which divide the field with the newspapers nowadays. There are the moving pictures and the radio for example."

(9) "Why do you give so much time to motion pictures?"

"I give so much time to motion pictures because I think they are as important as publications as agencies of publicity, both for information and entertainment."

(10) "Are you interested in radio and what does it promise?"

"I am very much interested in radio, but I do not know how much it promises for independent enterprise.

"It looks at present as if radio were likely to be controlled by a few large corporations and employed in great part for their propaganda.

"However, there may develop a great field for radio in connection with newspapers and news services."

(11) "Do you care to discuss the sale of stocks of newspaper corporations in the open market—and why do you sell bonds?"

"I sold bonds because I wanted to borrow some money, and I preferred to borrow it from the public rather than from Wall Street."

(12) "Is circulation the test of merit?"

"To a degree circulation is a test of merit. If any manufactured article sold more and at a higher price than another similar article, you would naturally infer that the one which sold the greater amount at the higher price was the better—or at least that it pleased the public better; and that is the main standard of comparison."

(13) "When are advertising rates too low?"

"Advertising rates are too low when they give the advertiser a great profit and the newspaper little or no profit as is often the case.

"Advertising rates are seldom too high, if an advertiser knows how to employ advantageously the publicity of a widely distributed and well established newspaper."

(14) "Will we have five-cent newspapers in America, and why?"

"I do not think there will be many five-cent papers unless the price of print paper materially increases."

(15) "What are the correct proportions of the daily ration in percentages—news, advertising, opinion, entertainment?"

"The correct proportions of news, advertising, opinion and entertainment are what every fellow has to figure out for himself with relation to the conditions which confront him.

"However, there is one thing sure, and that is that the news and the opinion, and to a certain extent the advertising, must all come under the head of entertainment to a reasonable degree or they will not be read.

"People do not read to be bored. They read to be interested, and unless we can make our material in every department interesting, it simply is not read; in which case we would be like the chap who winked at the girl in the dark—we would know what we are doing but the public would not."

SURVEY OF MILWAUKEE

Merchandising Service Bureau of Journal Prepares 200 Pages of Facts

The Merchandising Service Bureau of the Milwaukee Journal, has prepared an exhaustive survey of the Milwaukee Market. R. A. Turnquist is the Journal's advertising manager. This is an annual service, running usually to more than 200 pages of facts and figures.

According to the foreword of the survey, the bureau is maintained on a "basis of consistent co-operation with the manufacturer, his representatives, the broker, wholesaler, and retailer."

The survey covers vital statistics, wholesale figures, automotive figures, advertising lineage, building, and circulation, besides numerous other subjects of interest to space buyers.

NEWSPRINT PRICES TO BE LOWERED SOON

Indicated Reduction of $2 Per Ton, According to Reports—One Company Reported Selling at $3.65 Now

Reduction in newsprint prices is assured.

While paper company officials in New York were in general reluctant to make definite announcements this week, they plainly indicated that statements offering lower prices would be forthcoming, probably "within a few days."

The price to be quoted for the last half of this year, it seems, will be $3.65 per cwt., a reduction of 10 cents per cwt., or $2 a ton.

Pejepscot Paper Company is already naming this figure.

Among other companies the situation seems to be one of watchful waiting. They apparently want to make certain how the majority are going before they come out with final announcements.

At the same time, one high official of a New York concern declared emphatically that newspaper publishers "ough to be made to realize the fallacy of the policy of driving the newsprint industr from this country by demanding a pric for the commodity at which there ca be no profit for the American manu facturer."

Such a statement would seem to sho that American mills are being forced t lower newsprint rates because of the in crease in foreign importations.

"The American paper industry is drift ing across the line into Canada," on official stated. "Publishers are makin a mistake to allow this to happen. Whil Canadians may charge lower prices now they can always levy an export tax which would result in immediate an sharp inclines."

While this is given as one reason, th main reason, it is said, is due to over production of newsprint. High wate last winter, it is known, made for bi production. For that reason, accordin to report, such big companies as Inter national are making ready to curtail th output in some of their mills.

When this report was brought b EDITOR & PUBLISHER before an officia of International, he would not deny it truth, but declined to be specific in re gard to which or how many mills woul be curtailed.

What is feared is that the demand wil nowhere near meet the supply, accordin to one paper man.

ON TO BRITAIN FOR THE TWENTIETH CONVENTION A.A.C.W.

NEXT week's issue of Editor & Publisher will pay tribute to the greatest event in the history of organized advertising, the twentieth annual convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, Wembly, England, July 12 to 19, to be attended by an American delegation numbering two thousand.

Our issue promises to be the largest, most complete and colorful edition ever printed for the cause of advertising. It will contain the official program, full list of delegates, articles by the leading figures in advertising in America and Great Britain, with all the information concerning this extraordinary expedition which the visitor would require.

Editor & Publisher appreciatively acknowledges the magnificent support it has had in this venture from the advertising interests of this country and Great Britain, making possible this truly representative issue.

A surprise feature of next week's issue will be an inspiring announcement from the lively advertising and newspaper forces of Texas, in behalf of the cherished plan of the gem city of the mighty empire of the Southwest, Houston, to capture the 1925 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. An irresistible invitation will be extended through our columns and the slogan of Wembley promises to be, "On-to-Houston, 1925."

Final forms in the American section of the On-to-Britain number of Editor & Publisher close at noon on Tuesday, June 17.

A Niche All Its Own

NEW YORK June 9, 1924

TO EDITOR AND PUBLISHER:—In my capacity as an advertising man, I must keep in touch with all phases of advertising. EDITOR & PUBLISHER fills an important niche of its own and I read each issue with great relish and acquisition of knowledge, from cover to cover. To put in mildly, I would say that your medium is a liberal and broad education in all branches of the newspaper publishing business in cluding those high, inspirational qualities without which this profession could not be successful.

NEW DECALOGUE OF ETHICS ADOPTED BY A. N. A. E.

Columbus Convention Re-Elects Carroll President—Excessive Co-Operation Demands Denounced and 1920 Standard Again Commended—Classified Men in Session

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

By WARREN BASSETT

COLUMBUS, Ohio, June 11.—Newspaper advertising executives turned thumbs down on excessive and expensive merchandising cooperation with National advertisers at the annual convention of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, held at the Deshler Hotel, June 9-11.

F. T. CARROLL

Declaring that the abuse of merchandise service departments of daily newspapers has become a menace, constantly growing in proportion, the convention passed a resolution asserting that a firm stand should be taken by all newspapers. Commendation was expressed for newspapers which are showing leadership by adhering to the standards of practice of merchandising service adopted by the association in 1920, and declining to render "ridiculous and uneconomic socalled cooperation." The association urged all newspapers to stand firmly for the standards of practice and to exert every effort to discourage unethical and unreasonable requests for cooperation that "do not come within the scope of our standards of practice."

A resolution was also adopted condemning the use of the word solicitor as applied to those engaged in selling space in newspapers on the grounds that it is a misnomer and does not lend dignity to the profession. The use of the words "advertising salesman" was recommended in its stead.

A third resolution urging discontinuance of the practice of allowing a jobber or wholesale dealer to make a blanket contract for newspaper advertising, at local net rates, to force national advertising of commodities, thereby depriving the agency of its commission, was passed. This was termed unethical as well as unsound business practice.

The resolution condemning excessive merchandising cooperation expressed the dominant feeling in the minds of the assembled advertising executives. Virtually all of the more than 100 advertising managers present said that survey and merchandising requests from advertisers have passed reasonable limits. Scarcely a speaker on the crowded program missed the opportunity to cite some recent request for merchandising service, both absurd and expensive. The fundamental idea of furnishing market data to prospective or present advertisers was in no way criticized. The attack was levelled at the unreasonable and exorbitant requests which have placed increasing burdens upon newspaper advertising departments.

H. R. YOUNG

Another important action taken by the convention was the adoption of a code of ethics governing newspaper advertising. It contained 10 articles, stating general principles of practice and outlining the attitude of the profession on selling policies and the handling of accounts after they are obtained. In brief the code pledged support to the "Truth in Advertising" movement, stressed cooperation with all departments of the A. A. C. W., provided recognition only for bona fide advertising agencies capable of rendering complete and adequate service, and declared all advertising rates should be based upon run of paper service.

The code asserted that no advertisement should be published in the guise of news and declared that merchandising service should be governed by the standard of merchandising practice for newspapers adopted by the A. N. A. E. in 1920 and endorsed by the A. A. C. W. in 1922.

The code was presented for consideration by A. J. McFaul, business manager of the St. Paul Pioneer Press and Dispatch.

Frank T. Carroll, of the Indianapolis News, was re-elected president of the A. N. A. E. at the election held Wednesday. Harvey R. Young, advertising manager of the Columbus Dispatch was elected vice-president, succeeding George W. Preston, advertising manager of the Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette. Don U. Bridge, national advertising manager, Indianapolis News, was re-elected secretary.

Two new directors were named by the association, A. J. McFaul, business and advertising manager, St. Paul Pioneer Press and Dispatch, and Carl P. Sloane, publisher, Peoria (Ill.) Journal-Transcript. They succeed C. H. Tobey, formerly publisher, Boston American, and Nathan O. Fullmer, business manager, Salt Lake City Deseret News. Hold-over directors are: A. L. Shuman, advertising manager, Fort Worth Star-Telegram; Harvey R. Young, advertising manager, Columbus Dispatch; Joseph W. Simpson, national advertising department, Philadelphia Bulletin; Battle Clark, advertising manager, Nashville Banner; Frank T. Carroll, advertising manager, Indianapolis News; George W. Preston, advertising manager, Little Rock (Ark.) Gazette.

A. L. SHUMAN

One of President Carroll's first duties will be the appointment of a new advisory committee of 15, which will advise members of the A. N. A. E. on all problems arising in connection with their work during the year.

Other topics stressed by the convention were training of advertising salesman, placing the work of display men on a professional basis, efficient methods by which newspapers can advertise themselves and magazine tie-up compaigns simultaneously with the A. N. A. E. meet.

The Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers also held their annual convention, participating in several joint sessions with the advertising executives. The classified men used an extra day for their deliberations, adjourning Thursday, June 12. The display men adjourned Wednesday.

Selection of next year's convention city was left to the new board of directors. St. Louis and several other cities made bids. President Carroll indicated, however, that next year's sessions will be held as in the past at the city chosen for the A. A. C. W. Convention. A separate meeting was necessitated this year because of the A. C. C. W. meet going to London.

Following registration Monday morning at the Desher Hotel, a joint meeting of both organizations was held in the hotel assembly room at which the delegates were welcomed to Ohio by Governor Vic Donahey, and to the city of Columbus by Mayor James J. Thomas.

G. M. BURBACH

Charles F. Fischer, vice-president and business manager of the Columbus Citizen, welcomed the delegates on behalf of the local newspapers.

Frank T. Carroll, advertising manager of the Indianapolis News and president of the A. N. A. E., who presided at the meeting, then introduced Don Bridge, National Advertising Manager Indianapolis News, secretary A. N. A. E., who read the annual report. Bridge described the work of the advisory council, composed of 15 members, organized at the Atlantic City convention last year. This group has answered all questions pertaining to newspaper advertising submitted by members.

The speaker's bureau, also organized last year, has been especially active, Bridge reported. This bureau has provided speakers on newspaper subjects for meetings of press associations and advertising clubs. It has also supervised the preparation of the program for the newspaper departmental of the A. A. C. W. convention to be held in London in July. Bridge also reported the formation of a grievance committee, and the successful publication of the A. N. A. E.'s bulletin, "Newspaper Advertising."

One hundred and four new members have been admitted to the A. N. A. E. in the past year, the report stated. Total membership is now approximately 300. Net funds of the association totaled $3,277.

Newspapers could not exist without the department stores and department stores could not exist without the newspapers. Joseph B. Mills, publicity director of the J. L. Hudson Company, Detroit, declared at the beginning of his talk on "Department Store Advertising from the Inside"—the first speech of the A. N. A. E. afternoon program Monday.

"Advertising managers must know merchandising from the selling angle," he declared. "Today goods must be sold. Not long ago advertising was placed before merchandising. Today the situation is just the reverse.

"The American newspaper today stands preeminently as a result producer. This is no aspersion on other forms of advertising such as magazine and direct mail. But newspaper space can be relied upon to sell goods."

Mr. Mills declared tat direct mail is used by is store in connection with newspaper copy, sometimes sent out before the advertisement appears calling attention to unusual values to be merchandised, sometimes coincident with newspaper space, and sometimes as a follow up medium.

To show how completely newspaper advertising dominates the publicity of the J. L. Hudson Company, Mr. Mills quoted relative figures for the past year. Total publicity appropriation of the store totalled 3.6 per cent of sales receipts. Of this amount, 2.6 per cent or two-thirds, was devoted entirely to newspaper space.

A ripple of surprise greeted the Detroit man's statement that the Hudson Company, by building an addition to its store, expects to increase its gross sales from $30,000,000 per year to $50,000,000, "without the necessity of increasing our advertising lineage by one inch."

A. J. McFaul

This feat could be accomplished, he went on to explain, by increasing the efficiency of the sales force employed by the store, and by getting the last iota of "pulling power" from the newspaper space now being used.

"Copy writers must produce better copy," he said, "Not a line must be wasted. Ads today must compete with news for attention. I believe it is possible, with concentrated appeal, to make small space produce just as good results as large. Advertising is news and should be treated as such. The blue pencil should be used just as freely."

Special editions were hit in the department store man's talk. Declaring that under no circumstances would he increase the lineage of his store in any special edition, he backed the statement with the old criticism that such bulky issues are seldom read thoroughly by the public.

Not more advertising, but better advertising should be the aim of newspapers, Mills concluded.

"It is my belief that dailies should concentrate upon merchandise which sells. Too often the aim is merely more lineage. Whenever an advertising campaign fails because it tried to put across an inferior or unnecessary article, it hurts newspaper advertising."

Special editions, frowned upon by the department store executive, found a strong defender in H. W. Roberts, advertising manager of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

His answer to the question: "Is It Good Policy to Publish Special Editions In Order to Maintain Lineage Even If They Are Not Profitable?" was an emphatic "Yes," backed up by experience.

Acknowledging that the term "special edition" draws upon itself general condemnation, Mr. Roberts prefers the term "special supplement."

"The Cleveland Plain Dealer has developed many special supplements, and with general high success," he stated. "But before we undertake to publish one we make sure it has a constructive idea behind it either for the community or for a special industry.

"Its aim must be to create desire in the mind of the public. We believe jubilee editions celebrating the anniversary of the newspaper itself, or the birthday of the city are useless. They are not constructive.

"We are strongly convinced, however, that automobile, better homes, real estate, and tourist supplements boost sales and create desire. Personally, I am certain that the present tremendous sales in the automobile industry can be traced back to desire awakened in the mind of the public years ago. The force of constructive advertising does not die a week, a month, or a year after it appears; it is cumulative. I do not believe the dailies could stop publishing automobile supplements now if they wanted to."

Spring activity in real estate can be traced directly to the real estate supplements, Roberts declared. Not only is the attention of the public

Star-Telegram executives took as a basis the total local advertising revenue for 1922 and offered as a bonus 5 per cent of the increase in 1923, each man to receive a pro rata share according to his salary.

No raises in wages were to be made during the year, if a man left the employ of the paper he automatically lost his share in the bonus. New men added to the staff were to share only for the time they were in the paper's employ.

"We thought this system would greatly decrease the labor turnover, which in a comparatively small town where results depend largely upon a man's personal acquaintance, is tremendously expensive," Mr. Shuman declared. "In this, the plan was successful. We also wanted to cut down errors in copy and increase the efficiency of the staff. This, too, was accomplished. Individual claims were almost eliminated. A most excellent teamwork resulted.

"However, the actual amount divided at the end of the year was far less than we had hoped because of unfavorable business conditions. Nevertheless, not a man left the staff. This year we expect to have a large melon to cut with our

CLASSIFIED ADS DEFINED, STANDARDS SET FOR THEIR MEASUREMENT

These Hopes of Association Advanced by Columbus Convention, Which Votes for Statistical Bureau—Irvin Re-Elected President

By C. L. PERKINS

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

PROGRESS during the past year in newspaper classified advertising and in the Association of Newspaper Classified Advertising Managers was made evident by the 5th Annual Convention of that organization held in Columbus, Ohio, June 9-12.

J. L. IRVIN

The association's progress was shown by an attendance of over one hundred—the largest in the history of the organization.

Classified advertising's progress was apparent by the reports of various newspapers from all parts of this country and Canada; from large publications and small ones, showing that classified rates were now on a more profitable basis than ever before, that the make-up, classification and arrangement of classified advertising columns had been greatly improved from the standpoint of reader interest; that fraudulent advertising was being eliminated and truth in advertising given more consideration; that the methods of selling and promotion were along more intelligent and progressive lines.

How to Increase Voluntary Patronage was the subject of the first session. The round table discussion indicated that promotion in a newspaper's own columns was the best method of securing voluntary patronage and that most of this space should be devoted to creating reader interest.

Tuesday mornings session was devoted to ways and means of securing more business by telephone. The importance of proper training of telephone ad takers and telephone sales people was stressed. The consensus of opinion was that women were more satisfactory for telephone room workers. However the thought was expressed by some that men were better in selling to women over the telephone.

G. N. GUNDERSON

Reports from various newspapers indicated a tendency to give more and more of the servicing of contract advertisers to the telephone room, thus freeing more of the outside salesmen's time to developing new business.

Tuesday afternoon's session was a joint meeting with the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives and devoted to the subject of classified advertising.

Fred L. Tate of the Toronto Star spoke on "The Importance of Classified to a Newspaper." In an interesting manner he sketched the history of classified and its general developments over several centuries and predicted that the future evolution would be toward converting much of the local display advertising into classified as an economic necessity. Mr. Tate emphasized the importance of classified as a profit-maker for the paper, a builder of circulation, a stabilizer of circulation, a creator of good will.

W. W. Miller, Classified Advertising Manager of the New York Times, addressed the meeting on "How to Get More Classified Advertising for the Readers of Classified."

Mr. Miller stated that one of the best methods to build classified lineage was to build reader confidence by keeping out of the classified columns fraudulent and misleading advertising.

R. E. Seiler, Classified Advertising Manager of the Los Angeles Examiner, delivered an address on "How to Get More Readers to Read the Classified Columns."

He developed logical reasons for making the classified department an independent unit of the publication and for charging a profitable rate. He attributed the Los Angeles Examiner's wonderful growth in classified advertising largely to the large and consistent reader interest promotion campaign waged during the past few years.

C. L. PERKINS

These speeches were followed by a lively discussion on various phases of classified.

Wednesday morning meeting was a round table discussion on methods of increasing the efficiency of classified street salesmen. Here again the importance of proper training was shown. It was evident that well-trained sales staff had much less turnover and greater production than the untrained one. Methods of payment were discussed with general opinion that salary and commission were most desirable.

Wednesday afternoon separate meetings were held by the delegates from small and large newspapers. A. T. Miller of the Nashville Banner, conducted the meeting of members from smaller newspapers. R. E. Seiler of the Los Angeles Examiner presided over the session of representatives from larger publications.

At the first convention of the association five years ago the great majority agreed that Agate type only was the ideal in classified typography. It was interesting to note that at this session most of the classified managers expressed a preference for Agate with a limited amount of display type. As to the proper limit of display type there was a wide divergence of opinion.

One of the most lively and fruitful discussions was on the subject of defining what constitutes classified and methods of reaching a standard system of measurement.

It was agreed that the Association should undertake to promote a bureau to which members desiring to could send classified statistics compiled in accordance with a plan. It was the opinion of the meeting that in all statistics used for purposes of comparing with other newspapers or advertising lineage volume, net count lines should be used. It was also agreed that the lineage should be divided into two groups—the first to be the lineage which all newspapers could call classified. This advertising was defined as "any advertising printed in the regular classified section, under a regular classified heading and in accordance with the newspaper's typographical standards." Such kind of advertising as Auctions, Resorts, Travel, Legal, Educational, which is frequently sold by classified departments but set run of paper and in a different style than regular classified, was to be included in the second group according to the plan outlined.

Following these separate meetings a general business session was held at which John L. Irvin, Des Moines Register-Tribune, was re-elected as president; C. W. Nax, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, was reelected first vice-president, and G. N. Gunderson, New York Telegram and Mail, was again chosen for the position of second vice-president; Charles Winter, Chicago Daily News was elected treasurer; A. T. Miller, Nashville Banner, was selected secretary. The three vacancies in the Board of Directors were filled by the election of F. L. Tate, Toronto Star; H. G. Barringer, Indianapolis News, and C. L. Perkins, Chicago Herald and Examiner.

Thursday morning's meeting was devoted to problems of direct mail, solicitation and promotion. At this meeting the official monthly publication of the association, The Classified Journal, was discussed. It was proposed to enlarge the journal and make it still more beneficial in broadcasting news and information on the subject of classified advertising. To accomplish this the following staff was appointed: Managing Editor, H. G. Barringer, Indianapolis News; News Editor, W. S. Campbell, Toledo Blade; business manager, H. C. McDonald, Cleveland Plain Dealer; circulation manager, C. W. Nax, St. Louis Globe-Democrat; advertising manager, C. T. Harden, Columbus Dispatch. In addition to these officers, M. P. Goodfellow, New York American, was appointed editor of the editorial page, and the following were selected as associate editors: G. N. Gunderson, New York Telegram and Mail; Harry Gwaltney, Milwaukee Journal, C. L. Perkins, Chicago Herald and Examiner; R. E. Serler, Los Angeles Examiner; Clarence Millius, Santa Monica Outlook; L. L. Heaton, Philadelphia Bulletin; J. J. Tierney, Spokane Spokesman-Review; J. J. THIS WINS IT

The prize merchandising co-operation request out of the many cited at the A. N. A. E. convention was related by W. F. Johns, advertising manager, Minneapolis Journal.

"This particular request was nothing if not explicit," he said. "After asking us to promise the usual broadside to the trade, posters, and window display tie-ups, the letter requested a complete survey of the number of packages of the advertiser's product carried in the downtown stores.

"'This information must be accurate'; the letter warned.

"'Don't take a store owners' word for it. Go behind the counter and count them!'"

Facts in Daily Experience of Newspaper Executives, Told at Columbus

"IOWA IDEA" PRODUCED CONTRACTS AND CUT DOWN WASTEFUL COMPETITION

By HARRY T. WATTS

Business Manager, Des Moines Register and Tribune

JUST as the orange growers of California have increased sales by co-operative advertising, so have the daily newspapers of Iowa attracted a larger volume of national advertising to their columns by an aggressive co-operative advertising drive.

HARRY T. WATTS

A small group of Iowa newspaper men happened to meet at a state convention of advertising clubs last fall. These men discussed the unfavorable advertising which the state was receiving because of the drop in farm product prices and the speeches of her radical junior senator. It was decided that the best way to meet this was to tell the truth about Iowa and the Iowa market through an extensive campaign of advertising in Eastern newspapers. The first step was to call to Des Moines not only all of the daily newspapers in the state but their special representatives in New York and Chicago as well. The specials were taken on a hundred mile trip through a typical Iowa farming section and were given an opportunity to talk with farmers and small town business men as well as with the publishers from various sections of the state. The specials were then told of the proposed advertising campaign, asked for suggestions as to copy and thoroughly sold on the idea that there was abundant business in Iowa for manufacturers who would invite business through newspaper advertising.

It was first planned to raise a fund of 15,000 dollars from approximately 25 of the larger newspapers in the state, the committee not anticipating that some of the smallest dailies would feel that they could afford to contribute. Right there we were mistaken for within one weeks time every daily newspaper in the state of any standing had subscribed to the fund which totaled $18,200.00. It had previously been determined that the fairest basis of apportioning the cost of the drive was that each newspaper's national advertising rate. So each newspaper contributed $100 for each cent of its national rate. A newspaper with a rate of 2½ cents paid $250 while the largest newspaper with a rate of 25 cents a line paid $2,500. All funds were paid in cash before a line of copy was inserted.

The preparation of copy and the selection of mediums was placed in the hands of a committee of seven representing seven newspapers in six widely scattered Iowa cities. All agencies showing a desire to handle the campaign were given an opportunity to submit plans. It was then decided to give the campaign to 2 agencies both of which had submitted ideas which the committee felt were equally good.

The key-note of the campaign has been to drive home fact after fact showing the buying power and wealth of the Iowa market and then to emphasize that practically every family in Iowa reads an Iowa daily newspaper.

In totaling the Iowa circulation of the 32 newspapers we found that it exceeded 582,000. After allowing for duplication we proved that the Iowa daily newspapers reach 97 per cent of all the families in the state, city, small town and farm.

We dwelt on the very low cost of advertising in Iowa dailies—only 1.82 a line to reach every family in the state. (By the way, two Iowa state farm papers reaching but 40 per cent of Iowa's population collect a combined rate of $1.75.) We also outlined a uniform plan of merchandising which every one of 32 Iowa papers would give. Three page ads were used in the New York Times, three in the Chicago Tribune and other pages in the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the Detroit Free Press. Other space was run in the trade papers.

Each ad mentioned a booklet telling of the Iowa market and invited inquiries. All told somewhat in excess of 6,000 inquiries for the booklet have been received up to date. These have come from manufacturers, sales managers, teachers, other publishers and people in almost every walk of life.

As the plan developed it was decided that our own Iowa people needed this advertising as much as our customers in eastern cities so mats of each page were furnished to all of the 32 Iowa dailies for publication on the same day as the page appeared in Chicago, New York, Philadelphia or Detroit. This space amounted to another $25,000 bringing the total cost of the campaign up to $43,200.

So much for the details of the campaign. You now ask me what did the Iowa papers get out of it.

When the money was raised no one looked for direct tangible results. We had faith in advertising and counted merely on general publicity to create a more favorable impression of the possibilities of getting business for Iowa through the Iowa Press Association. But we were agreably surprised by being handed contracts for the entire 32 dailies for a 10,000 line campaign by Peet Brothers Company, soap manufacturers of Kansas City. Here at the very beginning of the drive we got back from one advertiser the cost of all the space we used in Chicago, New York, Detroit and Philadelphia. A short time later a refining company with headquarters in one of our Iowa cities of its own accord cancelled a large contract with the Iowa farm papers and bought 5,000 lines in all the Iowa dailies.

Now as to the general results of the campaign. It has been the means of inspiring favorable comment on the state and its newspapers in many publications.

But perhaps the best thing produced by the campaign has been the effect of drawing the Iowa daily newspapers into closer contact, to unite them in burying their petty competitive differences and in working out a uniform program merchandising co-operation that is constructive and in eliminating some of the expensive, non-productive practices of competition. The first joint Iowa campaign was concluded in May. A second campaign will undoubtedly be planned at an early meeting of the Iowa newspapers this summer.

As I mentioned a moment ago the publishers of Nebraska have already followed in Iowa's footsteps with a similar drive featuring the Nebraska market. Kansas publishers are planning a Kansas campaign, while the publishers of Missouri are endeavoring to get together on the same type of a drive.

MEASURING AND BILLING ADVERTISING

By FRED E. HUSSEY

Rochester (N. Y.) Democrat Chronicle

TO my mind the newspaper business is one of co-operation. Each department must do its share in making the paper complete. The advertising salesman should know this, and he should know that all departments are functioning in a way that will back up his sales arguments. My subject is "Efficient Methods of measuring and billing advertising space." I am not going to tell you of a system that is 100 per cent perfect and I don't know of any such system. My experience in this department has been confined to one paper and I can only be judged by what we have found to be best.

After the order is brought into the office we must be sure that it will go through the various departments as instructed by the advertiser. By this I mean that it will be set in the space ordered, that the proof will be furnished to the proper person, that it will appear on the proper days and finally that it will be billed right. We have an order that covers all of these points.

The measuring of our paper is taken care of by one person. We measure all display advertising one-half line above and below type or border. After the paper has been completely measured it is totaled by classification. Then all charge orders are drawn off on loose leaf day books which are arranged according to ledger account. We have five ledgers. The book is then totaled and it must agree with the total drawn off the paper. By this method we know that all charge advertising will be charged. These books are then passed to the bookkeepers who make the entries in their billing books. These are also loose leaf, showing original and duplicate and are column ruled, showing classification, and total linage, both for daily and Sunday. These billing books also provide for unpaid balances and credits. The last day of the month these bills are totaled and posted in the ledgers. The original is sent to the advertiser and the duplicate remains in the book and is not filed for thirty days.

Our reason for holding them that length of time is for reference purposes. We have used this system for three years and have found that it has almost entirely eliminated complaints and has thereby been a big help in building up the good will of our advertisers.

SELLING TIE-UPS WITH MAGAZINES CALLED BAD POLICY

By H. S. CONLON

Advertising Manager, Grand Rapids Press

WHEN Mr. Carroll assigned me the subject "Are Newspapers Justified in Selling Tie-up Advertising for Exclusive Magazine Campaigns?" I was of the opinion that most newspapers were of a unit as to what policy to pursue. I further enlightened myself on this subject by passing the same subject on to 100 newspapers for their opinion. I received about 60 replies. These letters were divided equally between morning and evening papers, first, second and third papers and papers with a circulation of 5,000 and up. With but one exception they were unanimous in the opinion that newspapers should make no attempt to sell tie-up advertising for exclusive magazine campaigns.

My own opinion, in not attempting to sell this class of advertising is that national advertisers have been shown many times that an entire appropriation can be spent in magazines and proofs of schedules mailed to newspapers with list of dealers in their towns and that newspapers will sell thousands of dollars worth of space in hookups at no cost to the advertiser "So why buy it when you can get the dealers to pay for it."

Remember, newspapers never share in the credit for successful magazine campaigns. But without newspaper support national advertisers would more quickly recognize that newspapers today are the best National media.

Then there is this unfairness to your own advertiser: When you sell a local tie-up to magazine advertising, you sell the full circulation value of your paper whereby sales possibilities created by magazine advertising invariably touches only a small percentage of the newspaper circulation. You cannot put the selling force in local tie-up copy that the national advertiser has in his copy, consequently a large part of its effectiveness is lost on your general circulation; while to expect to produce adequate returns for your advertiser on the small per cent of your circulation which would be duplicated by magazine distribution is in the nature of taking a desperate chance of affording unsatisfactory returns to a regular or possible advertiser who may be cultivated for a regular series of business under conditions sure to win.

It has been my pleasure to work on both the third paper and the first paper in the town, and, as you all know, the third paper and even the second paper, are usually hungry for any class of advertising that will increase lineage and they will certainly endeavor to sell hookups of this nature when the first papers do not set a good example by refusing to co-operate with exclusive magazine advertising. The first papers should be the leaders in refusing this class of co-operation and not be so thin skinned as to accept this hook-up business with the idea that if they did not run it the second or third paper would. You are unfair to your own best interests if your own paper does not refuse this first.

Here is a concrete example of how we are possibly tearing down our own good business to better establish magazine advertising. It is reported by a leading Chicago newspaper representative that sometime ago Thomas Emory, the Pacific Coast Manager of the A. N. P. A. Bueau of Advertising, called on the Oregon Woolen Mills, Oregon City, Ore., and attempted to interest them in national newspaper advertising instead of spending their entire appropriation in magazines. The advertising manager of the mills explained he was getting wonderful cooperation from the newspapers in connection with their national campaign. To prove his statement he invited Mr. Emory to step into his file room where he had on display newspapers in one corner that made up a very large pile, every one of which carried some advertising on the Oregon Woolen Mills, supporting the national campaign. The sales manager could not have conveyed his answer to Mr. Emory any better if he had taken 10,000 words to explain,

EDITOR WINS 30 YEAR FIGHT FOR HIS PEOPLE

Zerbey of Pottsville Republican Obtains Coal Operators' Agreement to 200 Per Cent Increase in Property Assessment and Fair Share of County Taxes

By JOHN J. LEARY, Jr.

WE all know of the winning crusades conducted by this, that or the other big city newspaper. Sometimes the crusades, judged from the standpoint of public service, are worth while. Sometimes they merely redound to the credit of the editor making them and are forgotten once he ceases to throw bouquets at himself.

We who live in the big cities, however, seldom hear of big things done by editors in the smaller places who within their limitations accomplish reforms fully as important to their communities as anything done by their brethren in the larger places. Even less seldom do we hear of a small town editor who does a job comparable with the biggest of big jobs done by the big town papers.

Down in Pennsylvania—in Pottsville, Schuylkill county to be exact—is such an editor in the person of Joseph H. Zerbey, owner of the Pottsville Republican and the Pottsville Morning Paper, who fighting single handed and alone has compelled the immensely wealthy anthracite owning interests in his county to accept the principle that all property in the county must pay taxes on valuations sufficently high to permit the county and the townships in it to provide decent schools, passable roads and a reasonable number of modern improvements.

He did it by the slow and at times painful process of educating the county up to the necessity of electing a board of county commissioners who would consider the rights of the entire county rather than the interests of the big coal companies and coal holding estates. It took him thirty years to do it. Now firmly entrenched, he is fighting to hold the gains he won for the county.

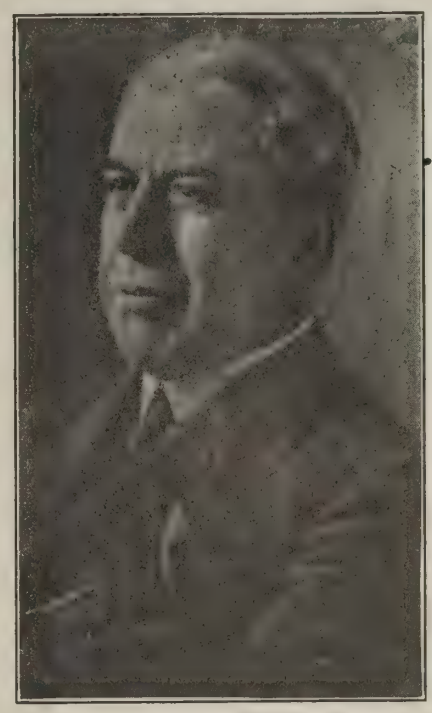
In a word these consist of an agreement of the coal interests that for taxation purposes their lands might be valued at $374,000,000 as compared with $53,000,000 in the last previous assessment and settlements with three of the largest holders on a basis of $152,000,000 for the county, or roughly 200 per cent more than taxes had hitherto been paid on. Many small holders have paid taxes on a like basis and, at last accounts, the remaining big companies while ostensibly fighting the increases and the methods by which the values were fixed, were actually engaged in what diplomatists would call "conversations" with the taxing body.

When they will settle is a question but there is no doubt in the minds of the county authorities that in due time they will pay on the same basis those who have already settled paid.

Schuylkill is one of the last of the anthractite counties to pass from the absolute control of the big coal companies. Previously Luzerne and Lackawanna counties threw off the yoke. They contain perhaps one sixth the coal that Schuylkill contains. What independence means is shown by the fact that on their coal deposits they collect taxes on valuations of $279,000,000. Both counties have splendid roads. Their towns have good schools and plenty of them.

Schuylkill today has few good roads and is pitifully lacking even primary schools.

Zerbey's fight against the great anthracite companies and the Girard estate, the largest anthracite holding estate in the world, was made necessary by the taxing system of Pennsylvania which made possible the almost direct fixing of values for tax purposes by the anthracite owners, and their grip upon the Board of County Commissioners which each three years finally fixes values for tax purposes of all the property within the county.



Under this system each township and each ward in a city has its assessor. The places pay poorly. The work involved is considerable. Frequently, if not usually —usually is perhaps the best term—the assessor is employed by one or the other of the great companies, or is otherwise under their influence. The means at their disposal for fixing values is meagre. Usually, therefore, they accept the values placed upon their properties by the coal companies. Hitherto the county commission, sitting as a board of appeals and revisions, accepted their figures.

In many of the small Schuylkill county towns the only property of consequence is that held by the coal companies or coal holding estates, chief of which are the Philadelphia & Reading, the Lehigh Valley, the Lehigh Coal & Navigation, and the Hudson Coal Companies and the Girard estate, whose revenues accrue to the benefit of the city of Philadelphia. Low valuation of the coal lands meant low revenues though what private property there might be paid more than its full share.

Consequently Schuylkill, the one county in the United States richest in mineral resources, was one of the poorest in revenues when Zerbey began his fight.

"There was," he said in telling modestly of his fight, "no reason why coal lands, the richest in the world, should not be taxed on valuations that represented decent fractions of their real value. It was, however, seemingly impossible to secure such valuations and the people of the county suffered in consequence."

What these sufferings consisted of may may be judged by the experience of the town of New Philadelphia which a few years offered the country the novelty of school teachers going on strike to force payment of their wages. At that time none of the teachers had been paid for a full term, to some the township was in debt for 15 months and all were at the end of their resources. What they owned had been spent, their credit had been quite or nearly exhausted, and they felt that patience had ceased to be a virtue. The strike was successful.

In that same town the schools built over great veins of anthractie were permanently cold because there were no funds available to buy coal with.

Other towns lacked and still lack for that matter any paved roads, others lack school buildings large enough to house the children of the residents. Most of the small towns lacked the commonest of modern improvements. Everybody in the county knew of these conditions, but nobody seemed to care much about remedying them.

"The usual response" said Joseph Hoffman, for many years associated with Mr. Zerbey, "was 'what's the use? You can't beat the companies.' Mr. Zerbey thought he could and he kept everlastingly at it. The ancient who went about crying 'Carthago delenda est' until finally Carthage did fall had nothing on him. In season and out he preached it.

"He believed, we all believed, that in time victory would come, but it was, I must say slow work. The companies were all powerful when it came to electing the county boards. Through their minor executives and connections they say to it that their men voted the way they wanted them to vote.

"That condition lasted until three years ago when we elected a board pledged to proper valuation of coal lands. In the following election, the opposition to fair taxes centered on Joseph Davenport who was up for re-election. Davenport went over by the largest vote given in the county. With him William James and Roy Brownmiller, who stood where he did, were elected. That clinched things. The county had been won to the principle of fair taxes on coal lands.

"How was it done? For a solid year we pounded away on coal each day comparing conditions in Luzerne and Lackawanna counties with conditions here at home. We would take towns of like size and compare them showing how much the towns in other counties had for their children and their adults and how little our towns had. It was hammer, hammer, hammer and coming on top of the long fight, put things over. That is, it elected the board we wanted.

"When the board met to pass upon the valuations of the assessors the coal companies and the big estates were, as usual, treated very, very kindly. The old valuations had been accepted. The board, acting as a board of appeals and revisions promptly put its own engineers to work and on the data they submitted, marked valuations for tax purposes from $53,000,000 to $442,000,000.

"To do this it was necessary for the most part to hire engineers from outside the county. Practically all the engineers in the county were in the service of one company or another and were unavailable for our purposes.

"The companies took the valuations into court and by showing that they had been assessed on 60 per cent of real values as compared with 45 to 50 on private property, they secured reductions by agreement of about 25 per cent, leaving the total values about $270,000,000.

"The companies did not quit then. They refused to pay and allowed their properties to be posted for tax sale. Some are still posted. No one, however expects them to lose their properties for whatever happens they can be recaptured within two years. Meantime they fought in the courts on one pretext or another. Sometimes the county won, sometimes they won. Between cases the Lehigh Valley and the Hudson companies settled. Then the Girard estate paid up. Funds were needed and the board agreed on compromises on the agreed valuation.

"It looked all right until the owner of an obscure tract secured a ruling that the method of figuring coal content and taxing on that was wrong and holding that recent sales should be the test. This reversed former decisions and has served to delay matters. What they will do next we don't know. The principle has been established, however, we have the board and we will continue to hold it.

"There isn't any doubt about that for when the time came to hear the appeals of the companies from their assessments, delegations came in from the various towns to oppose them. Whatever may happen with the big companies that have not settled, the low valuations will never return."

"Mr. Zerbey made a great fight and he's won, that's all there is to that," Commissioner Browntree told me. "The companies are fighting as they always have but in the end they will settle with us and they will abide by their settlements. Unquestionably it is the biggest thing that has ever happened in this county."

Mr. Zerbey, who is now 67 years old, nearly fifty of which have been spent as owner of his own paper, is not, as perhaps may be inferred anti-corporation or a radical. He is interested in various enterprises, has been honored by the editors of his state and not so very long ago joined the Philadelphia & Reading interests in fighting the proposal that the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad be turned over to the New York Central.

"I am not against the companies when they are right," said he. "The Reading was right in opposing consolidation and I supported it as a matter of fair play and public policy. In their policy of preventing fair valuations on their properties the Reading and other coal companies have never been right. Therefore I fought them as a matter of public policy and public honesty. The valuations now are not what they should be, but they are headed in the right direction—upward."

Of that there is no doubt.

Neither is their room for doubt that the race of fighting editors still lives.

Flaherty Optimistic on Enwright's New York Evening Paper

Optimistic reports were forthcoming this week from Frank B. Flaherty in regard to the start next week of the New York Evening Bulletin, Frederick W. Enwright's new Manhattan venture.

Workmen are rushing press installation and every effort is being made to be on the street Wednesday, June 18.

Flaherty denied that Charles Stoneham was interested financially in the Bulletin.

NEWS MEN KEEP COOL WITH "CAL" AT CLEVELAND CONVENTION

Nearly 600 Writers at "Biggest Assignment in Four Years"—Press Area Glitters With Brilliant Journalistic Names

By WARREN BASSETT

(By Telegraph to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

CONVENTION HALL, Cleveland, O., June 12.—Cleveland seethed with delirious humanity this week as the Republican hosts met to nominate a President and Vice-President of the United States, but the newspaper men were cool. Working night and day, with only short intervals for food and sleep, they recorded for the nation each varying and intricate phase of the huge convention.

It was the biggest assignment in four years and nearly 600 news writers, including the most brilliant personalities in the profession, were on the job.

The center of press activity was the convention hall where 568 reporters, editorial writers and feature men sat at long desks on either side of the speakers' platform. From this vantage-point the convention hall was an ocean of faces. It was a sight to remember—13,000 delegates and spectators packed into seats that stretched back row after row from the platform for a full city block. The bright hats of women delegates made a pattern of color through the crowd.

Bent over their desks, so close together their elbows touched, correspondents wrote running stories of the convention. Representatives of large newspapers and press association dictated in low tones to telegraph operators beside them. Soundless instruments were used.

Downstairs in the basement of the hall, temporary partitions had been raised to provide working offices for newspapers, press services and telegraph companies. A battery of more than 100 operators was on hand from Western Union and Postal.

A chute connected the press area upstairs with the basement level. Messenger boys relayed copy to the operators.

Newspapers and press services which maintained offices in the basement of the convention hall were: Chicago Tribune, Chicago Daily News, Christian Science Monitor, Cleveland Press, News, Times and Plain Dealer, Associated Press, United Press, and Consolidated Press.

A restaurant was provided on the basement level where news men were served with coffee and sandwiches.

During the sessions of the convention the press area resembled a score of city rooms merged into one. Copy was written in short "stakes" and sped below to the operators.

The press area glittered with brilliant names. Among the United Press contingent was Robert Bender, Fred Ferguson and Frank Getty. In the group representing International News was United States Senator Medill McCormick, Jack Lait, Helen Rowland, Ray Long, O. O. McIntyre, George Holmes, Barry Faris, and M. Koenigsburg.

David Lawrence and Robert T. Small were there for Consolidated Press.

Universal Service had Norman Hapgood, Damon Runyon and "Bugs" Baer in the press area. Arthur Brisbane, scheduled to write for Universal, was unable to attend.

George H. Harvey, former Ambassador to Great Britain, reported the proceedings for the Washington Post.

William J. Bryan, linked arm in arm with Will Rogers, attracted attention at the sessions as they took their places in the press area. Both wrote feature articles for the McNaught Syndicate.

Ring Lardner, William Allen White and Samuel G. Blythe were present.

Herbert Bayard Swope, Heywood Broun, Arthur Krock, Charles Michelson, George F. Authier were there for the New York World.

Hendrick Van Loon wrote daily humorous features for the Christy Walsh Syndicate.

William G. Shepherd represented the George Mathew Adams Service.

Uptown headquarters of the newspapers and press services were at the Cleveland and Hollenden Hotels.

Associated Press headquarters were in a large suite of rooms at the Cleveland. The ornate furniture had been replaced with low tables for typewriters and telegraph instruments. Six special wires were in operation here day and night.

L. C. Probert, Superintendent of the Washington Bureau of the A. P., was in charge of the convention staff of 23 men. Twelve picked operators, the speediest ment from the eastern and central divisions of the A. P. handled the wires.

United Press, I. N. S., and Universal Service maintained headquarters at the Hollenden on the parlor floor.

To the delegates who swarmed the hotel lobbies and the streets of Cleveland decked with guady badges, the convention was glamorous, but to the newspaper men it was only a glorified meeting of the city council.

"Cut and dried" and "well oiled" were the expressions.

There were no rumors of secret "deals" in hotel rooms between powerful political bosses. Only one hotel room door was honored by the attention of reporters. It led into the suite of William Butler, President Coolidge's campaign manager, on the fourth floor of the Hotel Cleveland. From 2 to 3 o'clock Thursday morning, a score of weary news men sat on the carpeted floor of the hall outside this door waiting for authentic word on the Vice-Presidential choice. Presently the door opened. The watchers leaped forward . . three men emerged . . . reporters. A consultation divulged that they had strolled into the conference with a group of delegates. A roll call had placed them on the outside again, but not entirely without some "inside" information.

While speakers droned interminably on the platform, newspapers blossomed in the press area. Veteran political men crossed legs, donned bored frowns, and read the news. A few news men—perhaps covering their first convention—bent low over pads and tried to catch every word.

The entire population of Cleveland seemed to be wearing badges. Those given to reporters were circular gold pendants backed with blue ribbon with the word "P R E S S" on the crossbar. It was the sesame to the packed convention hall, outside of which thousands swarmed hoping to break past the vigilant door-keepers.

To James L. Wright, chairman of the Standing Committee on Press Arrangements; James D. Preston, assistant secretary, and Joseph J. Jones of the Associated Press, goes the credit for excellent press facilities at the convention. Preston was in direct charge at the public hall. At no other convention have the press seats been so near the speakers' platform, he said. Radio amplification enabled reporters to hear every word of the proceedings with ease.

Jones was doubtful if facilities at the Democratic Convention in Madison Square Garden, New York, the week of June 24, would measure up to Cleveland. Failure of some of the large dailies to use their press seats furnished an opportunity for smaller Ohio newspapers to cover the G. O. P. deliberations. Preston released uncalled for tickets to many state papers in towns of from twelve to fifteen thousand.

Three hundred and fifty newspapers, press services, and syndicates were represented at the convention.

Every modern mechanical device for transmitting news was called into play. At the press tables, telegraph operators used soundless sending instruments to dispatch the flood of words pressed upon them by correspondents.

The American Telephone & Telegraph Company's new device for sending pictures by wire was used to transmit convention photographs to New York.

Radio connections with 12 powerful broadcasting stations enabled millions to "listen in" upon the speeches delivered from the platform.

New York newspapers rushed editions to Cleveland by aeroplane.

Copy paper littered the desk and floors. Small souvenir megaphones were used by the rear rows as ear trumpets.

There were many women in the press seats.

One of the oldest reporters at the convention was Harry P. Wilson, of the Philadelphia Record, who has covered every Republican and Democratic meet since 1892.

Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., grandson of Senator Lodge, was present as a member of the Boston Transcript staff.

Henry L. Mencken, on the scene for the Baltimore Sun, was impressed by the dreariness of it all. Interviewed by a local reporter his comment was: "This is the first dry convention in history. No booze, no enthusiasm!"

It was Ring Lardner who broke the ice in Press Row on the first day of the pow-wow. Correspondents were adhering strictly to the "no smoking" edict. Lardner looked about and calmly lit a cigarette—the first man to smoke in the hall. The rest of the press contingent speedily followed suit while delegates on the floor looked on enviously.

Special dispatches, editions, "deadlines" and the multitude of other worries of the correspondents were forgotten Tuesday night when visiting reporters attended the Prospect Theatre as guests of the Cleveland press committee.

It was a stag affair, followed by a buffet luncheon.

Sectional View of Press Stand at Republican Convention

ALL BRIEFS COMPLETE IN A. P. PROTEST FIGHT

Patterson and Gannett Place Case Before Proxy Convention for Admission of Baltimore and Rochester Papers—Brisbane and Gray Argue for Hearst Papers Opposing

MEMBERS of the Associated Press now have before them all arguments in the controversy which started at the April meeting over election to membership of the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union, both of which applications, it will be remembered, were opposed by competing newspapers owned by W. R. Hearst. As stated in EDITOR & PUBLISHER last week, the directors of the Associated Press have called a "proxy convention" for July 31, when the entire membership will be called upon to decide the question. A four-fifths vote is required for election to membership over a protest.

Argument for the Baltimore Evening Sun is signed by Paul Patterson, president of the publishing company.

Frank E. Gannett presented a brief and incidental argument for the Rochester Times-Union.

Opposing arguments are over the names of Arthur Brisbane for the Baltimore Sun, and Harry Gray for the Rochester Journal & Post-Express, the protesting members.

Mr. Patterson's brief in full follows:

"The Baltimore Evening Sun submits its application for membership in the Associated Press in the belief that the interests of all Associated Press members will be served by having another member paper in the evening field in Baltimore.

"As we pointed out to the annual convention, when this mail vote was agreed upon, we feel there is involved in the situation a fundamental principle that affects the whole future of the Associated Press.

"There are three questions we ask you to consider in deciding how you will vote on this application:

"1. Can the Associated Press afford to leave exclusive evening membership in Baltimore in the hands of William R. Hearst, who is the owner of the International News Service and the Cosmopolitan News Service, and who is interested in building up these services at the expense of the Associated Press?

"You are justified in voting to make the Evening Sun a member if you see danger in that situation.

"2. Is it proper that Mr. Hearst should use his protest rights to prevent his competitors joining the Associated Press and thereby compel them to buy the Hearst news services?

"You are justified in disregarding Mr. Hearst's protest if you see the unfairness in that situation.

"3. Are you satisfied to have your news of Baltimore and its vicinity, including Annapolis, come in the daytime only from a Hearst newspaper?

"If not, your remedy lies in voting for the admission of the Evening Sun.

"The sole argument made against the admission of the Evening Sun to membership has been that it is against the traditional policy of the Associated Press; that it would be establishing a bad precedent.

"The precedent established by the admission of the Evening Sun under the conditions that exist in Baltimore would only apply in other cases where Mr. Hearst, through the purchase of more papers, extended his exclusive control of Associated Press memberships.

"Already Mr. Hearst owns 15 memberships, spread throughout the United States, and in three cities—Baltimore, Rochester and San Antonio, Texas—he holds the only evening memberships.

"The San Antonio Light was added to Mr. Hearst's chain of papers very recently—since the Evening Sun's application was presented to the annual meeting. The acquisition of this third exclusive evening membership in the Associated Press by Mr. Hearst serves to emphasize all that has been said about the effect of Mr. Hearst's gradual extension of his monopoly of memberships in the Associated Press.

"There is every reason to suppose he expects to extend his chain to still more cities. In doing so he may add to the number of exclusive memberships in his control.

"How can the Associated Press hope to maintain satisfactorily its news sources under such circumstances?

"Our belief is that a most dangerous precedent will be established if existing conditions in Baltimore and Rochester (where the only afternoon news sources of the Associated Press are in the exclusive control of Mr. Hearst) are definitely made permanent through the rejection of the applications of the Evening Sun of Baltimore and the Times-Union of Rochester.

"It is the danger inherent in this situation that caused Frank B. Noyes, president of the Associated Press, to take the floor in advocacy of the Evening Sun's application at the annual meeting and support it by his vote. Mr. Noyes has repeated his views in the following letter:

Mr. Paul Patterson, June 3, 1924.
The Sun,
Baltimore, Md.

Dear Mr. Patterson:

I am glad to comply with your request that I give you the reasons for my favoring the election to membership in the Associated Press of representatives of the Evening Sun, of Baltimore, Md., and the Times-Union, of Rochester, N. Y.

In Baltimore—as also in Rochester—there is but one afternoon Associated Press member, the newspaper belonging to Mr. Hearst in each case.

Until attention was drawn to the fact at the annual meeting these Hearst papers practically ignored the Associated Press report, relying on the International and Cosmopolitan services (Hearst) for reports of news events that would be the conspicuous features of each day's paper.

Items taken from the Associated Press service were entirely subordinated to the news supplied by the Hearst-owned services, the news of the latter being in all cases conspicuously credited.

This is significant as evidencing that in the judgment of these newspapers their constituencies do not want the Associated Press report, but prefer the reports of the Hearst agencies.

It seems to me patent that with this judgment must necessarily go its corollary—that the local news supplied to the Associated Press by these papers is governed by the same selective instinct that has rejected the Associated Press report as of small or no value to a Hearst afternoon newspaper.

Evidence of this is found in the fact that the Associated Press Bureau in Baltimore frequently uses Evening Sun matter by your permission, regarding it as more suitable for our service than that supplied by our member.

If, since the annual meeting, the News shows a larger use of Associated Press matter than prior thereto, it could only indicate that its own news judgment is being subordinated as a result of the exhibits shown at the meeting.

At the annual meeting considerable stress was laid by Mr. Hearst's representatives and some in sympathy with him on the assertion that to elect the applicants in these cases would prove precedents dangerous to other members.

This argument did not appeal to me as in anywise sound.

I think it is clear that it is the duty of the membership to demonstrate their intention to have a member in both morning and evening fields in every important news center who is in harmony with the ideals, purposes and interests of the organization, in order that our co-operative effort may properly function.

I therefore think that the interests of the membership would be advanced by the election of representatives of the Evening Sun in Baltimore and the Times-Union in Rochester, and I will vote for such election.

Very sincerely,
(Signed) FRANK B. NOYES.

"It was the realization that there was no dangerous precedent involved that led Victor F. Lawson, of the Chicago Daily News, one of the builders of the organization, who had just been re-elected a director by the unanimous vote of the convention, to say in support of the Evening Sun's application:

"'Now, under the circumstances, I am perfectly frank to say that I think it is in the interest of the Associated Press as a whole, in the interest of every individual member, excepting, if you please, the objecting member, to admit the Evening Sun to membership. And I shall personally be guided by that view in casting my vote.'

"It was to allay the fear of precedent on the part of members who had not had an opportunity to give full consideration to all the problems involved that Adolph S. Ochs, of the New York Times, for twenty-odd years a director of the Associated Press, said to the convention:

"'So there is no need of fear that any precedent we are going to establish here will impair the value of our membership. Whatever impairment thereby may arise to that membership exists now, by reason of our by-laws. Every member who has a protest right is subject to its veto by the four-fifths vote of the membership. This feature is the one particular appeal we make to public confidence in this organization that it is not a monopoly, and that there is a possibility of newspapers coming in and getting the service if it is thought to be in the public interest.'

"Later Mr. Ochs added, by way of emphasis:

"'I do not think there is any newspaper in any community that need fear to have another newspaper put into competition with it through precedent which may be established here in a case where the protesting paper is so closely allied with a competitive news organization. I think it is well that you should bear that fact in mind.'

"Referring specifically to the point raised in our first question, Mr. Ochs said:

"'The Baltimore member (the News) is being served by a news report of a competitive news organization (International News Service). This is not peculiar to that Baltimore paper, for a great many of the members are also receiving that same report, and that cannot be any reason for any action against that paper. But in this particular instance the newspaper that is receiving that report is owned and controlled by the same interests that create and sell that competitive report.

"'There are many, many instances throughout the country where newspapers are taking that competitive report to keep some other newspaper from getting it. That is, the service is offered to our members throughout the country and some accept it because they do not want some other newspaper in the town served with it. So we have here a competitive news organization that has its life and being in this membership at Baltimore; and it is a very delicate situation for the men who are operating that (Mr. Hearst's) newspaper in Baltimore to make a clear distinction as to what obligation or loyalty they owe to the Associated Press, and what they owe to the other organization.'

"Mr. Ochs spoke also with particular emphasis on the point raised in question No. 2. He said:

"'The member (Mr. Hearst) who protests at Rochester, through an organization controlled by them, is serving the applicant newspaper (the Times-Union) with its competitive news report. It is perfectly natural for them to protest against that application, for if it were granted they would lose the applicant as a client. You can see the conflict of interest there.'

"It should not be necessary to emphasize to the members of this association the significance of these statements coming from such men as Mr. Noyes, Mr. Lawson and Mr. Ochs, who have so zealously guarded the interests of the Associated Press since its organization, and who, more than any other group of persons, have been responsible for the traditional policies that have protected the members.

"When the discussion ended at the annual meeting, Mr. Noyes, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Ochs and all the other members of the Board of Directors, with one exception, voted to admit the Evening Sun to membership.

* * * * * * *

"The specific conditions which have aroused such special interest and concern on the part of your officers and directors, and which, we feel, justify our urging your favorable consideration of the Evening Sun's application, were created a little over a year ago through the purchase

THE ORACLE

Have you a bunion, corn or pimple,
An undesired mole or dimple?
Have you a child that's growing simple?
Tell it to The Editor!
He'll show you how to fix the bunion,
To heal a breath caused by an onion!
An intellectual Doctor Munyon,
They all consult The Editor!

Perhaps your Thursday girl has blown you,
Or some sad speculation thrown you,
Or your rich relatives disown you—
Write it to The Editor!
If you can't get it through your noodle,
Why fulls and fours call for a roodle,
Or why your wife adores a poodle,
Just leave it to The Editor!

In solemn state he sits advising;
The things he masters are surprising!
So when your doubts come tantalizing,
Tell it to The Editor!
With instantaneous wit that bubbles
He'll solve your aggravating troubles;
If you would know how money doubles,
Go ask the "Answers" Editor!

A thousand times his vision passes
The love affairs of lads and lasses,
For which a thousand solemn masses
Are due the sapient Editor!
And these few lines to them that edit
Are writ to their eternal credit;
A thousand thousand tongues have said it
Who tell it to The Editor!

of the Baltimore News by Mr. Hearst from Mr. Munsey.

"During all the years that Mr. Munsey owned the Baltimore News, the Evening Sun did not ask for membership in the Associated Press because it saw no good reason why the traditional policy of the association should be set aside.

"The News then, under Mr. Munsey's management, was serving the membership well. Mr. Munsey was not interested in the ownership of any other news service, but on the other hand, was a most loyal supporter of the Associated Press.

PAUL PATTERSON

"Under his control the value of the Associated Press was emphasized at all times to newspaper readers in Baltimore.

"Local news was handled in a conservative but very thorough and accurate manner, and the Associated Press members were, therefore, given the best possible news service from this section.

"The purchase of the News by Mr. Hearst completely changed this situation. His representatives who took control of the paper immediately proceeded to tear down the good-will of the Associated Press, which had been developed and fostered so carefully, first by Mr. Grasty and then by Mr. Munsey.

"Mr. Hearst's representatives claim that the admission of the Evening Sun to membership will impair the property rights Mr. Hearst acquired when he purchased the News.

"But to all of us who are familiar with the Baltimore situation it seems quite apparent that those property rights, in so far as the good-will attached to the Associated Press membership is concerned, have already been destroyed by the manner in which the Baltimore News has handled Associated Press matter since Mr. Hearst bought it.

"All emphasis possible has been given to the International News Service and the Cosmopolitan News Service, the two evening press associations owned by Mr. Hearst.

"The vital point in this situation, however, and the point upon which we emphasize our appeal to you for your favorable consideration, is whether your news sources in Baltimore now are what you would like to have them.

"We are not attempting to say how Mr. Hearst shall run his newspapers. We have no criticism to offer in this instance of Mr. Hearst's policies or Mr. Hearst's politics. Mr. Hearst knows that the style of handling local news peculiar to his newspapers has proven popular in some cities and with certain classes of readers. He, therefore, chooses to have all his newspapers handle his news in that characteristic fashion.

"But we do not see why Mr. Hearst should have the right to say that all the Associated Press members must take that type of newspaper as their only afternoon news source from this territory. We do not believe the members of the Associated Press are satisfied with such a limitation upon their service.

"That is why we feel it would be to your interest to include the Evening Sun in your membership and let the Evening Sun also serve you in this territory.

"The strength of this association has come from the fact that the Associated Press has been built upon the fullest co-operation of every member. This is a mutual organization, Its continued success depends on maintaining an unbroken chain of the dominant papers in every city—papers that put the good of the Associated Press above every other press service.

"It is in the belief that the benefits will be mutual—that the Evening Sun will contribute to the strength of your association—that the dangers of exclusive control by members owning competing news service will be averted—it is in this belief that we urge your favorable consideration of this application."

Frank E. Gannett, editor and publisher of the Rochester Times-Union, the other applicant, couched his argument as follows:

"As publisher of the Rochester Times-Union, I have applied for membership in the Associated Press. I feel justified in asking for your vote in favor of the application for these reasons:

"1—The time has come when members of the A. P. should establish a precedent that no disloyal member will be protected in his protest rights and that the members of the A. P. will not permit this great news-gathering agency to pass into unfriendly hands, to be throttled and controlled by a competing organization.

"2—A favorable vote on this application will promote the interests of the Associated Press and increase the value of every membership in that organization. Favorable action means more to the Associated Press than it does to me, personally. As my papers hold six memberships in the A. P., I have the interest of the A. P. at heart.

FRANK E. GANNETT

"3—Hearst, by purchasing the Rochester Post-Express and merging it with his Rochester Journal, left Rochester with only two evening newspapers, the Hearst paper, (Associated Press and the Hearst International News Service) and the Rochester Times-Union (International News Service and the United Press).

"4—Hearst uses very little of the Associated Press report and submerges it. A table accompanying this statement shows that on the average he uses only fourteen marked A. P. items, mostly small ones, a day. He exploits and features his own I. N. S., a competitor of the A. P.

"5—Hearst is willing to sell and does sell the Times-Union his own International News Service, but he protests against granting the Times-Union the Associated Press membership. Thus, he is using his protest rights to build up and benefit the I. N. S. and to throttle the A. P. He knows that if we get the A. P. membership, we will drop the I. N. S.

"6—Hearst's Rochester paper is the filing office of all afternoon news out of this big city of 325,000 people. The Associated Press cannot afford to have in the hands of its competitor the control of this news center, when Hearst is advertising the superiority of his International News Service over the Associated Press service.

"7—The members of the Associated Press in New York State practically unanimously support the application. They are particularly eager to have the Times-Union a member of the Associated Press, because the Times-Union, as the largest evening newspaper in the State, outside of New York City and Buffalo, is in a position materially to strengthen the Associated Press and its service.

"8—My six other newspapers in New York State are members of the Associated Press, but as matters stand, none of these papers is permitted to transmit items to the Rochester Times-Union, the applicant, now a non-member. That is hardly fair. With the Times-Union a member of the Associated Press there will be complete co-operation in covering Central New York with its one million population. These million readers want the full Associated Press Service in preference to the Hearst news service, but they will not patronize the Hearst paper to get the scant A. P. report he gives them.

"9—Every member of the Associated Press should have the benefit of the news service the Times-Union can give the Associated Press, in contrast to the news service that comes from the office of the Hearst newspaper.

"10—I am in favor of absolutely protecting and guarding the Associated Press membership and protest rights, except where that membership is controlled by a competing service, whose natural tendency is to promote and exploit that service rather than the Associated Press.

"11—Hearst is constantly extending his interests and acquiring new Associated Press memberships. Where he becomes the exclusive member, as in Rochester and Baltimore and more recently in San Antonio, he comes more and more into a position to throttle any competition to his own wire service, in which naturally he is more interested and which he strives to develop until it is supreme. In exploiting the I. N. S. at the expense of the A. P., Hearst has forfeited the protest rights which loyal members of the A. P. should continue to enjoy.

"12—The members of the A. P. who heard the arguments put forth in the Baltimore case in the New York meeting voted almost four to one in favor of the application. If there had been a quorum present I am sure the application would have been granted. The same arguments in the Baltimore situation apply in the Rochester case.

"13—Hundreds of members have in letters expressed the belief that the situation in Rochester was injurious to the best interests of the Associated Press, and have said they would support the application. From the Hearst filing office in Rochester the Associated Press members already have been given many inaccurate, exaggerated and sensational news items. These weaken the public confidence in the Associated Press.

"14—The Times-Union has a circulation (A.B.C.) of 66,574. It is welcomed in nearly every home in Rochester. The Hearst Journal, in spite of every effort to inflate the circulation, claims a distribution of only 31,847. The reliability of the Times-Union is attested by the community's zealous support. As a member of the Associated Press it will revert credit on that organization.

ARTHUR BRISBANE

"15—The Board of Directors of the Associated Press, after having investigated the facts in the case, are practically unanimously in favor of granting the application for membership. In New York, in the annual meeting, Adolph Ochs of the Board spoke in favor of this application. President Noyes and Mr. Lawson of the Board spoke in favor of the Baltimore Sun, a similar case."

The protestants' case is stated as follows:

"The Baltimore Sun and the Rochester Times-Union, which are non-Associated Press papers, applied to the Board of Director of the A. P. for Associated Press franchises.

"The Baltimore News and the Rochester Journal Post-Express, Hearst papers, holding exclusive franchises in these two cities, protested against the admission of these papers.

"The Baltimore and Rochester applicants then took the matter before the annual Associated Press meeting and demanded that the general membership override the protest rights of the Baltimore News and Rochester Journal Post-Express.

"Owing to a quorum not being present when the vote was taken, a special meeting has been called for July 31, next, at which the whole membership of the Associated Press is requested to vote either to reject or sustain the applications of the Baltimore Sun and the Rochester Times-Union over the protests of the Baltimore News and the Rochester Journal Post-Express.

"Our claims for the rejection of the applications of these two papers for Associated Press franchises are:

"1. The admission of the applicants by the over-riding of the protests would greatly impair the property right of the protestants and destroy the values inherent in the benefits and privileges conferred by their right to the Associated Press service in their fields.

"2. The election of the applicants over the protests would set a precedent menacing to the property rights of all newspapers represented in the Associated Press. For what is done in the case of the Baltimore News and the Rochester Journal Post-Express may be done in the case of any other member.

"3. No Protest of Any Member Against the Application for a Franchise by a Competitor in the Same City Has Ever Been Overridden by the Membership.

"4. To set a precedent of this kind would practically wipe out the asset value of every member's newspaper, and no owner of an Associated Press franchise can tell when his turn may come.

"5. The news value of the Associated Press news, as a whole, is made up of the excellence of the news gathered from different localities by the individual members in those localities. It is admitted that whenever a newspaper property is acquired by Mr. Hearst its news facilities are increased and the strength of the local news gathered by the Associated Press in this locality is increased to the advantage of all of the members of the Associated Press.

"6. The Associated Press is a co-operative association of newspaper owners banded together for the mutual gathering of news and for the mutual protection of each other's rights to that news. The over-riding of the protest of two members in the present instance would point to the destruction of Associated Press mutuality.

"7. At the annual meeting when the question came up for a vote some of the members were undoubtedly influenced by Adolph Ochs, who said that Mr. Hearst always considered the welfare of his associates in any enterprise he might be engaged in with them, and Mr. Ochs asserted that if Mr. Hearst were present he would not endorse the protests of the Baltimore News and the Rochester Journal Post-Express. The first part of Mr. Ochs' statement is true; that is, that Mr. Hearst always considers the welfare of his associates. But, Mr. Hearst says that in the present instance he regards the attack upon the protest rights of Associated Press papers eventually as much of an injury to his associates as it is an injury to his own papers. This should remove any misapprehension any member may have on this point.

"8. The only claim of the Baltimore Sun as to why it should receive for nothing an Associated Press franchise which Mr. Ochs modestly appraised at several hundred thousand dollars' value, was that the Baltimore News did not give as much prominence to Associated Press cable and telegraphic news as the Baltimore Sun thought it should. This contention, if sustained, must operate to prevent the exercise of the individual judgment of every Associated Press newspaper in the presentation of news to its readers.

"9. The Rochester Times-Union's only reason is that it wants a franchise for nothing for which Mr. Hearst paid over a quarter of a million dollars, when he purchased the Rochester Post-Express to add to his Rochester Journal, and Mr. Gannett asserts that the protests of Mr. Hearst's paper is due to Mr. Hearst wanting the revenue which Mr. Gannett pays for the news of the International News Service. Indeed, Mr. Hearst, up to the time of the Rochester Journal and Post-Express protest, was not aware that Mr. Gannett received the International News Service.

"10. The Associated Press has survived for 75 years wholly on its quality of exclusiveness. Its competitors have arisen and disappeared through the commercialization of the gathering and distribution of the news. A vote to override these protests is a vote to break down the Associated Press by impairing the right of protest against the admission of new members in any local community. It would thus destroy the essential character of the Associated Press and destroy the asset value of all its memberships."

The Low-down on the Big Movie Stars

in 30 illustrated weekly articles

WATCHING the beautiful movie queen in her luxurious boudoir scene, it is hard to imagine her a gypsy baby sleeping under a tree beside a foreign river. Viewing in ecstasy the handsome features of the hero as he throws the villain over the cliff, it is difficult to think of him scraping the left-over beans off the plates of the cheap restaurant where he once worked as dishwasher.

WHIPPED AS A GIRL

And yet these are but a suggestion of the humble beginnings of many of the great movie stars and directors whose life stories are told in a series of 30 weekly illustrated articles. This series will reveal the truth about the men and women of the films—their real names, their early struggles, their matrimonial adventures, their eccentricities and hobbies, their good and bad traits, their physical and mental peculiarities.

One great star fled from the Cossacks who had burned her home. As a girl of 15 she felt the lash of the Russian ballet master. But now she wears an 18 karat diamond on one hand and a 16 karat on the other.

HAD FIVE HUSBANDS

Here is a movie actress with three husbands, all out of the picture now; another with five mates, one of them in the penitentiary. And still another with a succession of husbands but never a marriage certificate. Here is a director now famous who was once a hostler and a basement cabaret entertainer; an actor who graduated from the section gang to the stone quarry. His introduction to the screen was as a bouncer for a 5 cent movie house.

Each article tells the truth about a famous star or director. It is not an attack on Hollywood but an attempt to get under the fanciful claims of press agents and movie magazines. The articles are illustrated with photographs never before published. Write or wire for proofs and rates.

SAN FRANCISCO BULLETIN PURCHASED FOR MILLION BY SYNDICATE

Charles S. Stanton Leaves Hearst Service to Become Its Part Owner and Publisher—Holman of Argonaut and Page of Bulletin Also Stockholders

THE San Francisco Bulletin, one of the two daily papers which have survived since the pioneer days of the fifties, was this week sold to a group of local business men and is now headed by C. S. Stanton, for the past six years publisher of Mr. Hearst's Examiner, as publisher. It is emphatically denied that Mr. Hearst is in any way concerned with the transaction, Mr. Stanton naming the news owners as follows:

C. S. STANTON

Wallace M. Alexander, millionaire Hawaiian sugar man.

A. B. C. Dohrman, department store owner.

Alfred Holman, editor and proprietor of the San Francisco Argonaut.

B. B. Page, present business manager of the Bulletin.

Mr. Holman will be editor of the Bulletin and Mr. Page will be general manager.

According to unconfirmed report, the Bulletin was sold for about $1,000,000. Title to the building is retained by the former owners—the Estate of Loring Pickering, and R. A. Crothers, editor and publisher for 36 years. Mr. Crothers managed the paper for the widow and minor son of the elder Pickering for many years, and the son, Major Loring Pickering, has been for the past two years also manager of the North American Newspaper Alliance, with headquarters in New York. Mr. Crothers intends to travel in Canada and Europe.

Major Pickering declined to enlarge upon reports received from San Francisco. He intimated that he might resign as manager of the N. A. N. A., but stressed the uncertainty of his plans. He would not comment upon the denial by Mr. Crothers that Mr. Hearst was interested in the purchase.

Several other names mentioned as participants have been Herbert Fleishhacker, ostensible backer of the San Francisco Journal, fellow survivor with the Bulletin of the Vigilante period; Mortimer Fleishhacker, C. C. Moore, Stanley Dollar, son of Robert Dollar, the steamship man; and Paul Shoupe, of the Southern Pacific Railroad. Mr. Stanton denied that any of these were connected with the paper.

There were also reports that the San Francisco Journal, morning and Sunday, was to be taken over by the syndicate, merged with the Bulletin and killed, possibly retaining the Sunday issue. Andrew M. Lawrence, publisher of the Journal, denies the story, although he says he was approached. The Journal has no Associated Press membership, while the Bulletin is a member.

Another story published and denied was that James A. Callahan, business manager of the Examiner, had resigned from the Hearst organization and would join the Bulletin forces.

Mr. Stanton, the new co-owner and publisher of the Bulletin, is 56 years old and a native of Middleburgh, N. Y. He is a graduate of Union College, Schenectady, from which he also holds the honorary degree of Master of Arts. He began his newspaper career in 1885 as a reporter for the New York World, and he left that paper in 1893, as assistant managing editor, to become editor of the Albany Evening Union. The following year he became night editor and later editorial writer on the Chicago Tribune under the late Joseph Medill, which post he held until he went with the San Francisco Examiner in 1906 as managing editor. He returned to Chicago in 1914 as editor of the Chicago Examiner, but four years later went back to the Coast as publisher of the San Francisco Examiner.

The Bulletin was founded in 1855 by James King of William, whose assassination by a rival newspaper man and city official was one of the events which hastened the end of lawlessness in California. It is the only daily paper which has lived uninterruptedly the intervening 69 years, the Journal of Commerce having dropped out for a short time. It was conducted during the sixties and seventies by George K. Fitch and Loring Pickering, the latter also editing the Morning Call, owned by them. Messrs. Fitch and Pickering sold the Call in 1897 to John D. Spreckels. R. A. Crothers, brother-in-law of Mr. Pickering, had acquired an interest in the Bulletin several years before. Under Mr. Crothers' management, the Bulletin employed Fremont Older as managing editor and departed from the strict conservatism which had been its policy for several decades. Mr. Older left the Bulletin about 10 years ago and is now editor of the Call-Post, the Hearst afternoon newspaper.

PLAN NEW TROY DAILY

Joseph J. Murphy to Head Publishing Corporation

Joseph J. Murphy, of the Troy Democratic Leader, Rensselaer county, has purchased the Troy Sunday Budget and will form a new publishing corporation.

The paper will be changed to a Democratic Party origin and a morning daily issue is planned.

James Connell, of the Troy Record, formerly manager of the Troy office of the Albany Knickerbocker Press, will be associated with the new management.

A "City News" for Boston

Boston is to have a city news association, modeled on the lines of the New York City News Association, if plans now under way go through. These call for a service covering the courts, Federal building, police and court matters, and the more important city and suburban districts. Such an association served all of the Boston papers some 30 years ago.

To Make National Advertising 100% Effective in Cincinnati

Time was when magazine advertising alone could force jobbers to stock and retailers to push your line. Not so today. Mr. and Mrs. Consumer are doing the ordering; the retailer takes his instructions from them and the jobber takes his from the retailer. National advertising must be supplemented by local newspaper advertising before it can do a thorough selling job in the big cities.

In Cincinnati the Times-Star gives to the national advertiser the popular recognition of a local market six hundred thousand strong. It transforms "background" into "backbone" and converts "consumer acceptance" into consumer demand;—

Because the Times-Star has a daily city circulation that reaches four out of every five families in greater Cincinnati, practically the entire native white literate population;

Because the Times-Star carries the bulk of the advertising burden of all national advertisers who do business here (150 of them use no other newspaper in this market);

Because the Times-Star last year carried 3,851,869 lines of local display advertising more than the second evening newspaper and 5,757,416 lines more than the leading morning newspaper, exclusive of Sundays (1,525,020 lines more than this paper including its Sunday magazine editions);

Because the Times-Star is in fact a Cincinnati paper, owned by Cincinnati people, edited by Cincinnati people and for Cincinnati people.

Times-Star advertising is not a substitute for national advertising, but it is the greatest single force in making national advertising 100% effective in the Cincinnati market.

The New York Times Leads in Rotogravure

THE NEW YORK TIMES was the first American newspaper to publish a rotogravure section. It prints more rotogravure advertising than any other newspaper in the world and excels in volume and quality of response.

Approximately 600,000 persons buy the Sunday edition of The New York Times. Its sale in the metropolitan district, including territory within 150 miles of New York City, exceeds 400,000 copies.

The New York Times has the best equipped rotogravure plant in the world. It comprises five one-roll presses whose total output exceeds 3,500,000 sections weekly; four cylinder grinding and polishing machines, one depositing tank with generator, and four enlarging cameras. A completely new rotogravure plant is soon to be installed in a special building in a space twice that now occupied.

The circulation of the Sunday edition of The New York Times represents the widest distribution, metropolitan and national, of any American newspaper and an unequalled buying power. The Times goes to every state in the Union, into 8,000 cities and towns and into 87 foreign countries.

Mid-Week Pictorial, published every Thursday by The New York Times Company, is a national picture magazine, printed by the rotogravure process.

CANADA WEEKLY EDITORS EMBARK FOR EUROPE AFTER MEETING

L. A. Eedy Elected President at Toronto Meeting, Which Decides on Winnipeg for Next Convention—Will Visit Britain, France and Belgium

WITH an attendance of 365 members, the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association held its fifth annual meeting in Toronto, June 5 and 6, with an excursion across Lake Ontario to Port Dalhousie, June 7, by way of entertainment. Business sessions were held in the Physics Building of the University of Toronto and were presided over by the retiring president, J. E. Fortin, Beauceville (Que.) L'Eclaireur. Delegates were welcomed by Sir Robert Falconer, president of the University, after which the reports of the manager and treasurer, the auditor and the chairman of standing committees were presented and discussed.

Forums on advertising topics and on circulation and subscriptions during the two days of the meeting served to bring out much helpful information. A forum on job printing was also included in the program for the benefit of those members conducting job printing departments. Among the addresses delivered during the course of the convention was one on the psychology of salesmanship by Prof. C. S. Brett, head of the department of philosophy at the University, and one on the fundamentals of public speaking by Prof. W. H. Greaves, of the department of public speaking, Victoria College.

Election of officers and committees for the ensuing year resulted as follows:

President, L. A. Eedy, Walkerton (Ont.) Telescope; immediate past president, J. E. Fortin, Beauceville (Que.) L'Eclaireur; first vice-president, L. J. Ball, Vernon (B. C.) News; second vice-president, F. A. J. Davis, Carleton Place (Ont.) Canadian; manager and treasurer, E. Roy Sayles, Toronto.

Advisory Board, L. A. Eedy; W. R. Davies, Renfrew (Ont.) Mercury; J. A. Maclaren, Barrie (Ont.) Examiner; V. Dubuc, Chicoutimi (Que.) Le Progres; S. N. Wyn, Yorkton (Sask.) Enterprise; F. B. Elliott, Alliston (Ont.) Herald.

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"I do too much work myself"—HOWARD DAVIS

SUCCESS of a metropolitan newspaper business manager in the belief of Howard Davis, who holds that position on the New York Herald Tribune, depends upon his ability to pick able men for the key positions, mechanical, advertising, and circulation.

"And then," opines Mr. Davis, "he must know how to get along with those men."

Whether or not Mr. Davis has followed the rule he preaches may be read in the success he has had in New York journalism. He has proved he knows all key positions well himself, which, at least, is one important requisite for the picking of competent assistants.

"But I do too much work myself," he will tell you, thinking perhaps of the many glorious afternoons he might spend playing golf at the Pelham Manor Country Club, he helped to organize. "I get impatient and want to see the business done quickly. And that isn't the right method, you know.

"Take Louis Wiley on the New York Times," he began, but the eulogy was interrupted, because everyone knows the ability of the Times business manager.

Anyhow, Mr. Davis has a decided leaning towards the mechanical side of newspapering. Coming from a family of printers, he knows just where every bolt in a huge newspaper press belongs. In this respect no one will deny, he outshines his competitor in the Times Annex, a few blocks further uptown.

During the strike of New York pressmen, in fact, Mr. Davis ran number one press for the Tribune himself, with amateur assistants. Then he was grimy printer at night, sleeping on two tables drawn together in his office upstairs, and during the day time attending publishers' meetings with the union leaders.

Although his title is business manager, Davis is essentially publisher of the Herald Tribune. Ogden Reid from training and inclination prefers the editorial side.

Starting in newspaper work at 16 on the Scranton (Pa.) Republican as a general utility man in the business office, Mr. Davis believes firmly in the small town as the best training ground for newspaper men.

In 1909 he took charge of foreign advertising for the New York American. Previously he had been the eastern representative of the Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles Examiners. On the American Davis had experience in every executive position in the business department, but he always maintained direction of the advertising. In 1919 he accepted Mr. Reid's offer to become business manager of the Tribune. He is now second vice-president of the publishing company in addition to his other duties.

NEW IOWA DAILY STARTS

First Issue of Sioux City Register Out June 6

The first issue of the Sioux City (Ia.) Daily Register, the third daily newspaper in Sioux City, was published June 6. The first issue contained sixteen pages, seven columns to the page. It has contracted and is using the United Press wire and the NEA feature service.

This newspaper is published by The Register Publishing Company, which is incorporated with a capital of $25,000. The project was started by the striking Sioux City newspaper printers and is said to have the official endorsement and financial support of more than one hundred labor organizations in the middle west.

R. E. Austin is managing editor, Keith Graul is advertising manager and E. Almquist is circulation manager. J. M. Kaspar, president of the board of directors, is business manager.

The paper declares that it is "an independent newspaper published every evening and Sunday morning. Devoted to the freedom of the press and the liberty of public opinion, with no interest to serve but the public good."

The two other daily newspapers are the Tribune, morning except Sunday, and the Journal, afternoon and Sunday.

You will save money with the Ludlow says Supt. Prophet

HERE is what E. W. Prophet, Sup't. of the Composing Room of the Philadelphia North American, wrote to a newspaper investigating the Ludlow.

"We have had Ludlows in our plant for about six years. They give you no trouble; upkeep next to nothing; can be operated by any printer. Low cost of Production. First cost is final. Our mats are as good as new. We have made no replacement of mats and we have no foundry type in our ad room, except a few special faces for a couple of advertisers. You no doubt see the North American and note the volume of business carried. Our ad room is without type—this is a fact.

The Ludlow has done great things for us and I can't sing its praises too highly. It is the best system on the market today, and I hope you decide to put them in. You will save your concern money and yourself a lot of worry."

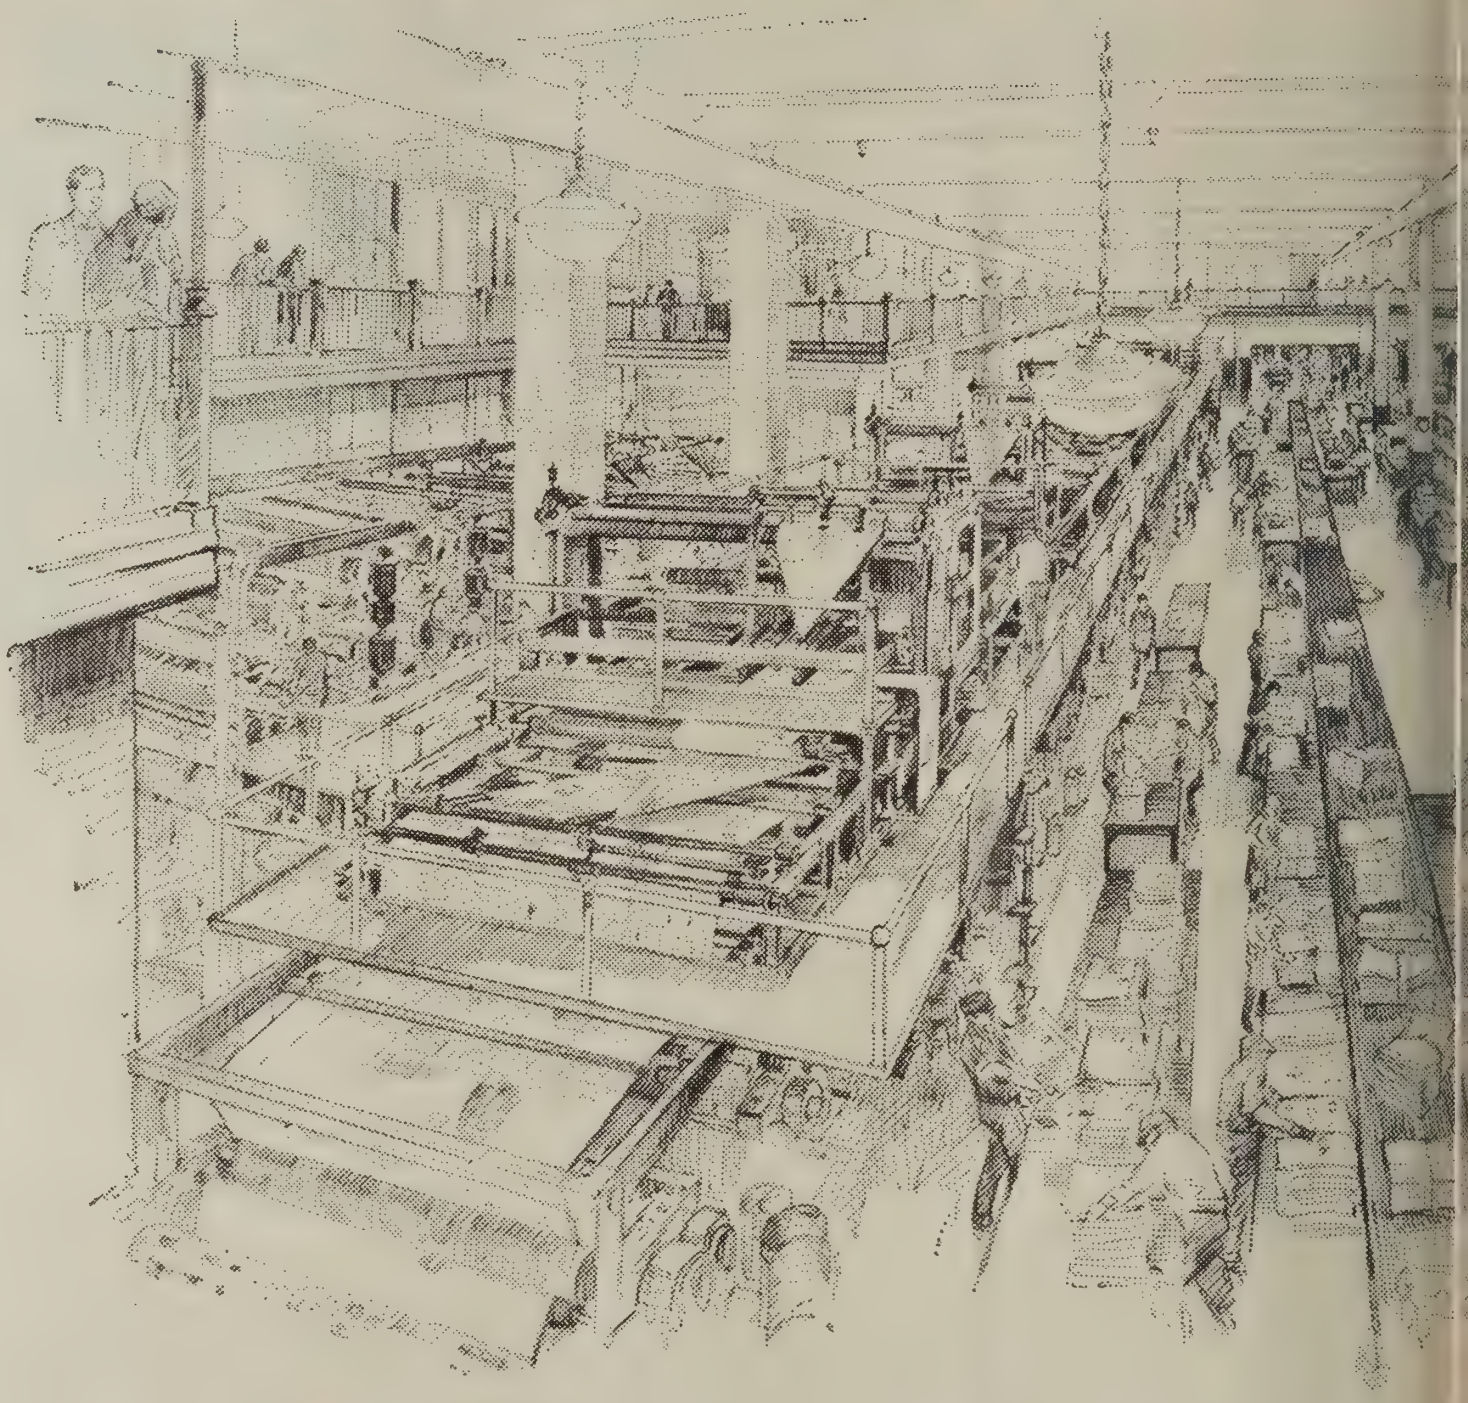
Consider This Tremendous Market

Pennsylvania is a permanently prosperous market presenting every conceivable trade advantage to be found anywhere on earth.

Population	8,720,017
Number of Families	1,922,144
Urban Population	5,607,815
Rural Population	3,112,202
Number of Wage Earners	1,136,210
Wages Paid	$1,406,463,000
Average Wage per Year	$1,235
Number of Motor Cars	1,043,770
Number of Personal Income Tax Returns	621,103
Per Capita Income Tax Paid	$9.70

These facts show that this great commonwealth offers an excellent trial territory to any advertiser who seeks to test the appeal of his commodity to Americans of the substantial, discerning kind.



The daily newspapers of Pennsylvania reach the buying public oftener than does any other media possible to use.

These influential daily newspapers of Pennsylvania join in offering National Advertisers every co-operation in introducing and popularizing their products in this great State of Pennsylvania.

"The World's Great

"Have just seen the world's greatest newspaper plant," cabled Senator Paul M. Dupuy, the French publisher, to his Paris office, after visiting the mammoth new printing establishment of the Public Ledger in Philadelphia. "Discontinue work on our new plant until I return."

Three giant presses with a capacity of 360,000 24-page newspapers an hour. One 20-cylinder multiple-color press with a capacity of 20,000 32-page Sunday newspaper sections an hour. A battery of 57 new linotype machines—the largest single installation in history.

View from gallery in the press room of the Public Ledger's new printing plant, showing sections of the three giant multiple presses capable of printing 360,000 24-page newspapers an hour. Floor room is available for doubling this capacity to provide for future growth.

These are just a few of the mechanical marvels assembled in this great plant—the first big unit of a vast publishing building being erected by the Public Ledger. This, when completed, will be the most efficient and perfectly organized equipment ever built for printing a newspaper.

The Public Ledger is unique in Philadelphia. Its presses never "sleep." Thirteen regular editions—morning, noon and night—are printed daily, giving readers and advertisers alike a continuity and completeness of newspaper service without competition.

VANDENBERG'S AMENDMENT

A. H. VANDENBERG, in a recent number of Editor & Publisher, definitely proposed, as he had casually suggested at Atlantic City during the convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, an amendment to the Canons of Journalism, and asked for comment.

The article would read: "To its privileges under the freedom of American Institutions are inseverably joined its responsibilities for an intelligent fidelity to the Constitution of the United States."

That is not clear.

It will be interpreted according to preconception or preference.

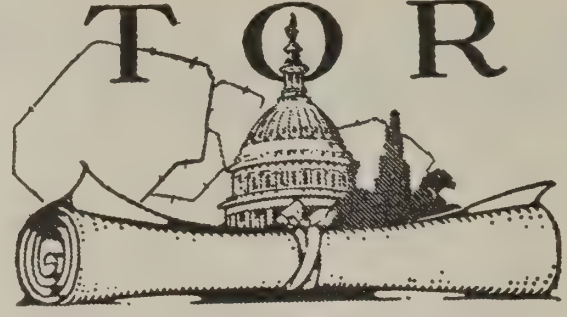
To the conformist type of mind which blindly accepts authority and stands for the form and the symbol throughout life, it means that the last word has been said, the Constitution of the United States is sacred, unalterable, inviolate.

That view, concerning mortal things, is mistaken. The Constitution is our conception of a national charter fitting our present need and reaching into the future as far as we can perceive. That it shall be altered to meet changed conditions, as we progress or retrograde, is as certain as is the fact that the original draft of the Constitution, once held by its advocates to be a perfect instrument, has been greatly changed to meet the requirements of new generations confronted by new problems.

We do not believe that Mr. Vandenberg means to chain the action of the newspaper press to any finally fixed set of articles which are satisfactory to the majority of this generation, indeed are held by us to be the precious jewels of democracy, but which, in the light of a hoped for higher civilization will seem as inadequate to future generations as would the original Constitution, deprived of its amendments, seem inadequate to us.

The true function of a progressive and useful press is to articulate the common thought and asperations of the people and thus assist crystallization of public opinion into rules of government making all men free, prosperous and happy. Nothing could be more dangerous than a pledge to remain fixed to a fallible existing order.

Mr. Vandenberg speaks of "intelligent fidelity to the Constitution." Those who are today defying the 18th Amendment do not admit that they lack fidelity to the Constitution and they base this conceit upon a "superior intelligence." That is one interpretation which might be made if the Vandenberg amendment were in force.



"Intelligent fidelity" is a flexible phrase.

Why must newspaper editors be singled out to pledge "intelligent fidelity" to the Constitution? It begs an almost absurd question. The schoolboy's pledge of allegiance to his flag and the Republic for which it stands, is a citizen's promise of faith and duty, good enough for all men, including newspaper editors.

Suggestion: Ask pressroom foreman to turn in to the publisher or manager a small sample of every roll of newsprint mounted on the presses, with identifying marks. Test each sheet for even texture, smooth surface, color and whether brittle. Thus you may be able to talk turkey to your mill, for consistency of paper quality is the test of service and the vigil must be constant.

KEEP IT IN MIND

IN December, when Congress reconvenes, there will be another drive for increased pay for postal employes, and there is no present evidence that the same forces that proposed to saddle on second class matter at least a part of the increased expense will not continue their efforts. President Coolidge's emphatic veto of the measure in the closing hours of the last session apparently did not end the matter and publishers should not fail to keep this fact well in mind. Congress made no attempt to override the President's veto, for understandable political reasons. When Congress reassembles, however, all political bets will have been settled.

PROVERBS

CHAPTER XX. 14

The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?

THE CHICAGO MURDER

THERE are those who believe, and sincerely, that the treatment the rank and file of American newspapers have given the ghastly murder case at Chicago, during the past three weeks, is "exploiting crime" and "trading on the morbidity of the general public."

A few newspapers lend color to this charge by making a practice of stringing out such a story, repeating and featuring its sensational phases as long as the subject will bear it, and often more, and surrounding it with a glamor of pasty romance and insufferable sobbing. When the legitimate supply fails, these newspapers fake to drag out the interest and hold circulation gains.

But the average newspaper, we observe, has unfolded the facts from Chicago, without fear or favor, that the people who read may know. And the people have a right to know what is happening in their world, whether it be ugly or fair. Newspapers are vital when they deal with the realities of life.

Press critics sometimes strike at the messenger, rather than the source of evil tidings. The degenerate Chicago murder which has horrified the reading public is an indictment of the social order in what is very properly described as the "jazz age."

Would the critics of the press prefer, in the name of decent living, that such rank growths as Leopold and Loeb should be glossed over, minimized, suppressed? Would they have the newspapers enter into a conspiracy of silence and permit such evil conditions to brew horrors beneath the surface? In such circumstances the public would rightfully draw an indictment against journalism. When evil conditions persist in the face of exposure, the indictment rightfully rests against the social system.

Frueh makes a good comic series on radio pictures, depicting the funny changes a fan got on his screen at home. The idea seems remote and unreal, but not more so than did popular international radio conversation, only a few years ago.

A JAPANESE IDEA

S. MIKI, business manager of the Hochishimbun, Tokyo, paid his respects at Editor & Publisher's office this week, telling of his great newspaper, with 2,600,000 combined morning and evening circulation, 18 sectional editions, 200 branch offices, 2,000 employes, publishing 10 pages for the equivalent of one cent, 50 per cent advertising and getting the equivalent of $1,500 per page. One-third of the circulation is in Tokyo.

Mr. Miki revealed the curious fact that an advertiser is not permitted to occupy more than a page at a time; indeed, if he takes more than two columns he is charged an increased rate, and four columns an upward call for still higher rates. "We do not permit any advertiser to monopolize our columns," he said.

Which is a point of view worthy of consideration.

Pure notes are struck by Henry Edward Warner, of the "Baltimore Sun," in his "Songs of the Craft," appearing serially in Editor & Publisher. Better verse for newspaper men has never been written, for the author is a true craftsman, thrilling to the romance, the heartbreak and the glory of the cause.

CHECK UP!

EVERY merchant inventories his stock annually. Why don't you inventory your "stock," department by department, checking waste, carelessness, incompetence and neglect? Who is doing you good work? Who is failing? Who makes friends for your organization by good business methods—who loses old friends through bad business practice? Is your credit rating good through prompt payment of bills and are discounts taken where possible? Who approves purchase requisitions and are supplies sensibly ordered? Who is wasting telephone calls? Who is extravagant in telegraphing? Who knows the amount of postage required for circular mail? How do the figures on paid circulation, gross press run and print paper bills jibe? Does every advertising salesman, circulation solicitor, collector and reporter, turn in to his chief a weekly statement showing his production and thus, by a system of average, demonstrate his relative value? Are incompetent men keeping good men out of jobs? Is there a waste of gas in the stereotyping department, electricity in the press room? You would want an expert's advice on these questions.

It is the function of good management to know the answers to such questions and the time to regulate expense is before the money has been spent.

The fact that the recent annual religious assemblies and conferences received first-page play almost everywhere and that the largest number of reporters in the history of these meetings were reported present, seems to indicate reviving interest in church news.

EDITORIALS

"WHY are editorials not read?" is a question debated in Oregon Exchanges, and we find the editor of the Akron (Ohio) Beacon Journal saying: "The editorial of today scarcely rises in its loftiest conception beyond the pot boiler stage. The fellow who writes it must fill the space . . . We think there are many editorials worth reading and others senseless and useless, with the general result less effective than any department of the modern newspaper, due not so much to the incompetency of writers as to lack of fixed policy or uncertainty as to what "the boss" wants said, that worthy of being incommunicado.

The synonym for "advertising" is "selling." Think of your copy, not as the message of a third party, but as the direct selling argument of the first party addressed to the second party, the buyer.

PERSONALS

R. B. ROSS, formerly representing the Hearst Service at Buenos Aires, well known at Washington and also South America, has begun publication of America, a rotogravure weekly at Buenos Aires, a novelty in Argentina. WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

LUCILE VAN SLYKE has just signed a contract with the Bell Syndicate, New York, and will write serial stories for them. Her first, entitled "What Every Widow Knows" is ready for immediate release. It will run for 12 weeks daily, six days a week, and is not illustrated.

LUCILE VAN SLYKE

Mrs. Van Slyke is the wife of Charles Van Slyke, Albany correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune. At one time, she wrote for the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, Inc., New York, which placed her story "Brides Will be Brides." She has had stories accepted by the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies Home Journal.

Maximilian Elser, Jr., part owner of the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, Inc., New York, sailed for abroad last Wednesday on the S. S. "Paris." With him were Mrs. Elser and their three small children, Elizabeth, six years; Peter, four years, and Henry, seven months old. Mr. Elser said that after a vacation on the coast of Normandy, he would go to England on business for his syndicate.

Mrs. E. M. Gilmer, widely known as "Dorothy Dix," writer for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia, sailed from New York last week for a visit on the Continent.

Lewis Wilson Appleton, Jr., is author of "Murder on the Limited," a serial, which will be released June 21 by his syndicate in Philadelphia. "Pat and Matt," a weekly comic story, will be released by the same syndicate June 14.

Bell Syndicate, New York, has just renewed its contract with H. C. (Bud) Fisher, creator of Mutt and Jeff.

A new art page in pen and ink by Frank Godwin, has been added to the feature list of the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia. It is entitled "Vignettes of Life." Mr. Godwin is a magazine and book illustrator, having contributed to Cosmopolitan, Hearst's, Harper's Bazaar, and others.

The Ullman Feature Service, Washington, D. C., announces a new series of weekly articles by Frederick C. Russell to provide lead stories for automobile sections. The new Russell releases will be semi-editorial and deal with motor touring, camping, varying state auto laws, gasoline taxation, uniform traffic laws, with the many arguments for and against uniformity, headlight glare, and other subjects of motoring.

Ad Schuster, star reporter of the Oakland (Cal.) Tribune, called the "O'Henry of the Pacific Coast," has signed a contract with Bell Syndicate, New York, to furnish a daily short story of 750 words. Release of the first is set for Aug. 10. He has been writing short stories for newspapers daily for the past three years. He was formerly connected with the George Mathew Adams Syndicate.

Reginald Sweetland's "Fools Crossing," a short story, will be released to newspapers by the Chicago Tribune Newspaper Syndicate June 29.

John Back, cartoonist, is drawing a one column comic of new type for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia, called "Today's Horror-Scope," an astrology burlesque.

Sol Hess, cartoonist, who draws "The Nebs," a comic strip for the Bell Syndicate, New York, recently offered a $150 watch to the reader who would suggest the best name for a well water he was featuring. Within three weeks, 200,000 letters in reply reached the Bell Syndicate office. An extra force of six clerks had to be engaged. Hess was forced to donate two watches, two persons suggesting the winning name, "Knox-Age," one in Halifax and the other in Oakland, Cal.

Beginning at an early date Raymond Poincare, retiring premier and former president of France, will contribute through the Ledger Syndicate a series of articles interpreting French and European policies. The articles will range from 2500 to 3000 words each, and will be released twice a month. Mr. Poincare will cover such problems as: 'The Execution of the Dawes Report," "The Financial Recovery of Europe," "French Relations with England and Germany," and "The General Structure of the Entente."

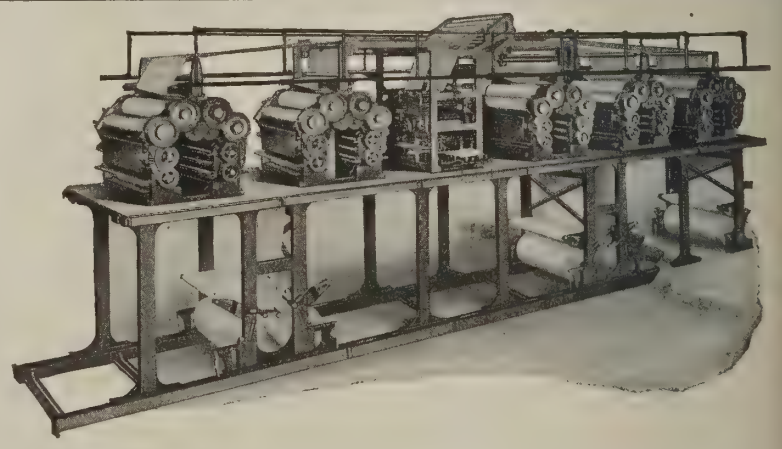
HADLEY PARTNER OF ELSER

Metropolitan Newspaper Service Now Owned by the Two

Earl J. Hadley, for two years associated with Max Elser, Jr. in the conduct of the Metropolitan Newspaper Service has become Mr. Elser's partner in both the management and ownership of the syndicate. Mr. Elser previously owned the Metropolitan in its entirety.

MAX ELSER, JR.



Mr. Hadley was assistant managing editor of the New York Globe and in charge of features and departments when he resigned to join the Metropolitan. This was the year before the sale of the Globe. Previously Mr. Hadely had been city editor of the Sun.

It was while they were both reporters on the former Evening Sun, that the partners got to know each other first in 1910. Mr. Elser had previously been a cub on the Evening Sun at 17, but had gone to college, rejoicing the Evening Sun's staff after taking his A.B. degree at Cornell.

E. J. HADLEY

Mr. Hadley is a graduate of Stanford. At Stanford he was editor of both the Chaparral, the undergraduate humorous magazine and the Stanford Quad the student annual. At Cornell, Mr. Elser was an associate editor of the Cornell Daily Sun and editor of the Widow, humorous publication. Mr. Hadley is now in sole charge of the office during the absence of Mr. Elser, who has sailed for a trip abroad, combining business with pleasure.

The

INDUSTRIAL SUPREMACY of NEW ENGLAND

The real facts indicate that New England continues in industrial supremacy and shows an increase in every statistical head.

No. of establishments, 25,528	Per cent of increase	1.2
No. persons engaged in manufactures, 1,535,033	Per cent of increase	21.0
No. wage earners, 1,351,761	Per cent of increase	18.8
Capital invested in manufacturing, $5,758,137,000	Per cent of increase	96.0
Amount wages paid in industrial plants, $1,436,435,000	Per cent of increase	138.
Value of manufactured product, $7,183,070,000	Per cent of increase	145.
Value added by manufacture, $3,231,161,000	Per cent of increase	154.

These New England states having but seven per cent of the total population of the country have ten per cent of the income of all states. Income tax returns total ten per cent of total number.

The per capita income tax paid is $9.90, nearly 50% more than the average for the country.

You can absorb to yourself a fair share of New England's orders by familiarizing its two million newspaper readers with your name and the merits of your goods through these dailies.

These dailies mean leadership. Use them regularly.

HAL FINK DIES

Advertising Manager of N. Y. World Had Been Ill Four Months

Harold ("Hal") Fink, advertising manager of the New York World died Tuesday of this week in New York, following an illness which started last March.

HAL FINK

All his life he had spent in daily newspaper work. At his death, he was vice-president in charge of New York State of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, to which he was appointed last August.

His home was in Pittsburgh. For 12 years he was with the Clover Leaf newspapers, 5 of which were spent in traveling the foreign field from the Chicago office. Then he was with the Omaha Bee and the Omaha News as advertising manager, later becoming business manager of the Sioux City News and the Indianapolis Sun.

Until Dec. 1, 1915, he was business manager of the Duluth News-Tribune, when he came to New York to become advertising manager of the New York Evening Mail.

Remaining with the Mail 2 years, he resigned and after a lapse of a few months was appointed advertising manager of the New York Herald. He came to the World from the Herald. On the World he succeeded the late George Larke, with whom he had been associated on the Mail during the war years and on the Indianapolis Sun.

Funeral services were held Thursday at the Campbell Funeral Church, New York, and were attended by a large delegation from the World. Burial was at Latrobe, Pa.

Obituary

FRANK A. WINN, for many years an employe of the Boston Transcript, died recently in Woburn, Mass. He became associated with the Transcript Sept. 16, 1868, and was one of the last of the group which was with the paper at the time of the Boston fire.

JOHN ARMSTRONG MACKELVIE, editor since 1893 of the Vernon (B. C.) News, and member of Parliament for Yale since 1920, died suddenly at Ottawa, June 4. He was born in St. John, N. B., in 1865, going west in 1883.

EMIL SCHMIED, 64, is dead in Chicago. From 1887 to 1900 he was first with the Duluth Times, then business manager of the old Duluth Daily News and finally publisher of the Herald before Col. A. C. Weiss bought the latter.

N.E.A. STOPS TOUR FOR BRONSON FUNERAL

Editor Honored Two Weeks Ago by Fellows on His Deathbed— Had Long Career as Newspaper Man

Death beckoned to Edgar S. Bronson at his home in El Reno, Okla., as members of the National Editorial Association which elected him president two weeks ago, neared Oklahoma, returning from a week spent as guest of the Mexican government.

E. S. BRONSON

Entertainment features planned for the editorial party were cancelled in order that all might attend the funeral services in El Reno Sunday afternoon, June 8.

Mr. Bronson, editor of the El Reno American, was on his death-bed when the N. E. A. honored him by its choice for the presidency. The following day, the Oklahoma Press Association paid him similar tribute.

George W. Marble of Fort Scott, Kan., re-elected to the vice-presidency of the national association, automatically succeeds to the presidency.

Mr. Bronson was born on a farm near Edina, Knox County, Mo., December 2, 1858. His parents moved to Kentucky in his early youth and it was while working his way through Pendleton Academy, Falmouth, Ky., that he learned the printer's trade in the plant of the Falmouth Independent.

Later young Bronson did reportorial work on the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Louisville Courier-Journal and St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

At one time, associated with Charles D. Morris, former owner of the St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette, he owned the Trenton (Mo.) Tribune.

In 1900 Mr. Bronson was sent to Oklahoma City as a staff correspondent for the Kansas City Star and Times. Two years later, in company with N. A. Nichols,—his partner until death—and a group of other Trenton, (Mo.) folk, he founded the town of Thomas in southwestern Oklahoma and established the Thomas Tribune in a tent.

Through the necessary practice of trading with the Indians, Mr. Bronson started a collection of curios which has grown to one of the largest in the United States.

Since moving to El Reno a few years ago, Mr. Bronson had created a unique adjunct to his newspaper plant—a museum and rest-club-committee room open for public use.

The American, the Bronson-Nichols paper was awarded a silver loving cup at the recent N. E. A. convention for having the year's best front-page makeup.

NEWS STUDENTS TO TOUR

University of Missouri School Will Take Party on Long Trip

Nebraska, Iowa and South Dakota will be visited on the annual field trip of the School of Journalism of the University of Missouri, from June 8 to August 2.

The men's trip, which will leave Columbia when the girls return on July 7, will go to Kansas City and St. Joseph and thence to Council Bluffs (Ia.) and Omaha (Neb.). From there the party will go to Sioux City and into South Dakota.

The trip was established last year by Dean Walter Williams. Students pay their own expenses and are required to send stories daily to one or more metropolitan dailies.

Rates Rise in Cedar Rapids

The Cedar Rapids Gazette, which maintained its $5 a year carrier subscription rate through war-times, this week raised the rate in Cedar Rapids, Kenwood Park and Marion to $7.80 a year, or, if paid in advance, $7. Announcement of the increase pointed out that since 1914 print paper costs have doubled, news service cost increased 55 per cent and engravings expense is 36 per cent higher, while special features represented an increased cost of 794 per cent. Carrier service, even, has gone up 162 per cent.

Dispatch Company Appeals

Refused registration as a dealer in securities under the "blue sky" law of Pennsylvania, the Daily Dispatch Publishing Company of Pittsburgh filed an appeal in the Dauphin County Courts for reversal of the decision of the State Banking Department, which declined to grant the company a permit to sell stock. It is contended that the refusal was not a decision of the Secretary of Banking, as required by law, but was made by a deputy. The Daily Dispatch Publishing Company was incorporated in April, 1923, and is seeking to dispose of 300,000 shares of stock at $5 each, fixing a maximum commission of 12½ per cent.

Light Firm Introduces Employes

To promote better acquaintance between the personnel of the Peoples' Light Company and the Davenport (Ia.) public, General Manager C. N. Chubb this week began a series of advertisements built around some member of the organization. A photograph of the person, a story of the position occupied and a paragraph of his duties, length of service and bit of personal history are utilized. This new weekly series will supplant the personal letters from individuals of the corporation to the public, which has been notably successful.

New Type Retail Ad Appears

The Golden Rule, a St. Paul department store, is running in the local dailies full page copy on "Creative Merchandising." The ads appear at intervals of several days. Each carries an essay written especially for the page by some well-known writer and is bordered by illustrations showing the advance in business methods in this and old-world countries. Among the writers contributing are Richard Burton, poet and professor of English literature at the Uvinersity of Minnesota; Miss Frances Boardman, dramatic and music critic; and George B. Woods, professor of English in Carleton college.

Cleveland Has Woman Sports Writer

Mrs. Ross Tenney, widow of the late sporting editor of the Cleveland Press, has taken up the work her husband carried forward for several years and her baseball stories of big league games are proving interesting to fans. Mrs. Tenney usually went with her husband to the games and learned to score as well as he could. She was his companion on all his trips with the big league teams.

APRIL
IS A RECORD BREAKER

During the Month of April The ALTOONA MIRROR

published 1,101,952 lines of paid advertising, an increase of 241,052 lines over April, 1923.

There must be a cause for this wonderful gain. Local merchants say it's the pulling power and Reader Confidence.

To convince yourself of this fact, write to any merchant in Altoona and ask him why the advertisers used 229,124 lines more in April, 1924, than in April, 1923.

SMALL CITY NEWS MEN WIN TRIBUTE FROM WHITE, PULITZER WINNER

Assistant Editor of San Diego Sun Will Stick to the West After Visit to New York—Can Call Up the Mayor Back Home and Heal Marital Woes—Would Be Short Story Writer

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

SMALL city newspaper men may claim an ardent booster in Magner White, of the San Diego (Cal.) Sun, winner of this year's $1,000 prize for best reporting, who breezed into New York this week, and, after a few frenzied looks, was quite willing to breeze right out again.

"New York doesn't charm me at all," he confessed, when the writer met him near the city desk of the New York World. He wanted to see the wheels of metropolitan journalism go around. For the first time in his life, he had come east of the Mississippi, escorting San

MAGNAR WHITE

Diego's marble "King" to the championship tournament just concluded at Atlantic City, N. J.

"Newspaper men can have much more fun in small cities, and learn much more.

"You can duplicate anything in the west that's in New York—only on a smaller scale," he continued. "The West is so small you can see the wheels go round, in politics, in business, in newspaper work, and everything."

And. whether or not small city journalistic experience is responsible, White has been and is a keen observer of the so-called "wheels of life." Conversation with him makes that known shortly.

In the Pulitzer prize-winner this year, one sees essentially a man with ability to observe, to retain, and to record his observations; a man denied a college education, and therefore all the hungrier for that elusive thing, knowledge. He haunts libraries seeking fact information he can use to bring profit to his pen, not just a mass of undigested wisdom to be used in passing a college quiz.

His father was a minister of the Southern Baptist Church in Texas. One day a book agent came along and sold Dad Edgar Allen Poe's complete works.

"I read every line of those books," White will tell you. "And I took to heart a large part of Poe's philosophy."

White is a newspaper man from worn soles to stub pencil—a newspaper man who loves writing, talking, and dreaming. From printer, he has dragged himself upwards, his wife, he claims, pushing, until now at 30 as assistant editor of the San Diego Sun and a "colyumist," he is a considerably bulbous frog in a moderate sized puddle. He became assistant editor only since the Pulitzer award. Before writing his winning story about the eclipse of the sun, he was just reporter and column conductor.

"Why," he will exclaim excitedly, "Hell's Fire! I can call up the Mayor of San Diego any day and tell him to block off a street because I want to hold a plug horse race or something. And he'll do it too!"

Unhappily married come to Magnar White's sanctum in the Sun building for advice. He receives hundreds of letters from subscribers as a result of his column conducting, and, what is important to the trade, he knows stops to press to inflate the sagging mail bag.

"Just a short time ago," he recalled, punctuating his remarks with enthusiastic expletive, "I straightened out the maritial troubles of an elderly photographer and his wife. He wanted to use his home as a dark room. And that annoyed his wife some, let me tell you. She couldn't recieve callers half the time for fear of spoiling hubby's negatives.

"Well, I went over to their house, and sitting down between them, talked it all over.

"'See here, old man,' I said to hubby, 'can't you do your developing at night?'

"'I want my sleep,' says he obstinately.

"The I turned to his wife. 'You want your husband to get ahead, don't you?' I asked her. 'Someday I'm sure he'll get enough money ahead and be able to run a fine big studio down town. Then you'll be proud of him, won't you?'

"That softened the womanly heart. Divorce was avoided. The photographer and his wife are now among the happiest in San Diego."

And all this, White is proud to tell you, can be accomplished in a small city, and in a small city only.

Yet despite his eagerness to sing panegyrics, the San Diego newspaper man is anxious to climb on to larger fields. New York or the east will never win him, though, he insists. He could never be persuaded to go back on the west.

Since winning the Pulitzer prize, he has received many flattering offers.

"But I intend to stick by the people who have stuck by me," he declared, referring in emphatic phrases to the Scripps-Howard Newspapers of which the San Diego Sun is a link.

"They have given me freedom of mind, and allowed me the widest opportunity for development possible. But I expect they will transfer me to San Francisco next fall."

Newspapermen, White believes, go through certain processes of development similar to the different college grades.

While a newspaper freshman, White was confronted by the common dilemma. Editor or writer, which would he be?

He decided for the latter and now is determined to make a name for himself in some small way in American literature. And, because he has the painstaking patience of a Milton, one rather expects to see him succeed.

"I early discovered I didn't like desk work," he remembered. "An editor has so many petty details to fret about. The battle of a writer is internal entirely, while the battle of an editor is harassingly external."

Interested, the writer endeavored to find out just what field of literature White intended to cultivate. Poe's influence is uppermost, it seems, and he plans to concentrate on the short-story.

"But Hell's Fire!", he awed me once more, "I dashed off a poem on Woodrow Wilson to catch an edition just after his death was announced. Think of that! And Mrs. Wilson acknowledged it, too."

Although inclined towards confidence today, there was a time, White revealed, when he needed the pressure of his "girl-wife's" will to advance the spark and start him chugging down life's road.

"I was a country printer in Davenport, Washington," he said. "My wife believed I could write, when I wasn't quite sure. She urged me to get work upstairs. We moved to Spokane. There, in fact, she literally led me by the hand up the elevator and to the city editor's desk, of the Spokane Chronicle.

"'Here,' she told him, 'is my husband. He wants a job.'

"I got it."

White's first day on the Chronicle was a thriller. In Davenport, he had spent part time gathering personals. He thought that's what he was supposed to do on the larger city daily. He visited the railway depot and gathered together 200 personals, rushed them into the office. Buying the early editions, he found they were not used, so gave that up.

He continued wandering about town, wondering where he could find news. Finally he happened by a dingy-looking building, just as a man was tossed from a doorway on his head.

"Perhaps this is a story," he thought. He lingered nearby.

"What's it all about," he questioned a man, who, like him, was watching two shaggy men who were continuing beating the unfortunate fellow who had caressed the pavement with his head. This man, White later found out was William Brazier, close friend of Big Bill Haywood, of I. W. W. fame.

"Who are you?" Brazier wanted to know.

White was ashamed of his efforts as reporter, so told him he was a printer from Davenport looking for a job.

"I'll give you a job," said Brazier, and let the young reporter into the inside story of a contemplated I. W. W. invasion of the northwest timber lands. White listened carefully and learned all about the planned I. W. W. sabotage campaign—all the intimate details.

After obtaining a complete story, White went back to the Chronicle, wrote it, and turned it over to the city editor. That gentleman sprang from his chair and rushed down to the press room, without saying a word.

White waited for the newspaper to come from the presses and looked for his story. He says he began at the back page and worked through towards the front. He was about to give up in despair when he found it the biggest story on page one.

After telling of thrills he experienced while reporter at Boise, Idaho, when he covered a riot on the capitol steps, White came to his prize winning story about the eclipse of the sun, written for the San Diego namesake of Old Sol.

"I wrote it hurriedly, between editions," he said. "Of course I had spent several days beforehand studying astronomy in the public library.

"A hardboiled former New York newspaper man on the desk didn't like it at all. He wanted it written in bulletin style and said so. But the editor insisted that it should be run as I wrote it.

"When they told me it had won the Pulitzer prize, you could have knocked me down with a feather.

"That isn't the best story I have ever written. I think my best was a feature about Potters Field, San Diego.

"I have been knocked pretty hard about the eclipse story, in the east. People want to know what public service it performed. And the only answer I can give them is that any newspaper story which makes readers look outwards from themselves, lifts them out of the terrible doldrums of life, performs a public service."

And he added, naively:

"The San Diego public library since the story was printed has been kept busy supplying readers with books on astronomy

It's More Fun To Cheer Because The Milk Wasn't Spilt!

Of course, a good many people seem to prefer spilling it—and having a good cry afterward. Even some newspaper publishers!

But not one of them need lament over the spilt milk of summer classified advertising losses—as long as the Smith System stands ready to turn them into heavy gains by Fall.

Following a plan like ours in a naturally dull season might be called striking—not when—but until the iron is hot. It's also another case of locking the stable door before the horse is exposed to homesickness—not afterward!

POSTAL PROBE PRAISED

Publishers Present Recommendation to Republicans at Cleveland

The American Publishers' Conference and the National Publishers' Association, presented the following recommendation to the Republican National Convention, Cleveland this week:

"We commend the present efficient management of our postal service and its handling of enormously increased volume with gradually diminishing rates of expense, together with the inauguration of continuous air mail service from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

"We approve all proper methods for the widest dissemination of information and to that end favor the expeditious and economical distribution of newspapers and periodicals.

"We commend the investigation being conducted by the Post Office Department to determine the cost of handling the different classes of mail matter which will enable the Administration to prescribe just and equitable rates with due regard to the service rendered and the aid of the National Convention."

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

COPYRIGHT 1924 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER—ALL RIGHTS, INCLUDING FOREIGN RIGHTS, PROTECTED.

Journalistic Warfare

The wordy warfare between Mr. Bennett and his journalistic enemies had now begun to increase in intensity. Mr. Noah, who had become one of his most embittered opponents, knew Bennett well, from having employed him as a writer on the old Courier, and realized that there was no possible weapon available to attack the Herald and its fearless editor, except abuse, and that he wielded vigorously.

It appears that when Mr. Bennett began his fateful struggle to stand alone in the newspaper field, he had borrowed small sums of money from various friends, among them at that time being Noah, who claimed he had loaned Bennett $100. In 1839 he sued to recover this amount, and in response, Mr. Bennett penned this amusingly vindictive editorial attack:

"If the poor, mean, beggarly, contemptible, superannuated Jewish infidel—a vagabond by order of the Almighty since Titus took Jerusalem—who publishes the Evening Star, and insulted this Christian city by his infamous "Book of Jasher," thinks that I shall write him into some notice in his name, he will find himself mistaken.

"The old drivel now owes me over $200 for services rendered. When the action at law was brought in, the old clo. scoundrel pleaded the statute of limitations, and as such the case now stands, as David Graham, Jr., can testify. The truth is, the extraordinary talent, circulation and success of the Herald alarms the Wall Street press for their very existence.

"As to Noah or any of the tribe, they are only fit to be exhibited as monsters to a gaping world at a shilling apiece."

A new antagonist now appears on the stage of this journalistic drama, in the person of Moses Y. Beach, who bought the Sun from his brother-in-law, Mr. Day. His ability and energy were remarkable, and he rapidly built up the circulation and advertising patronage of his paper, which had fallen off steadily, during the last year of Day's management. On September 17, 1839, Mr. Bennett published the following slap at the Sun's well known wavering attitude toward the two principal political parties:

"JACK o' BOTH SIDES.—It is amusing to see the tricks resorted to by miserable politicians to retain and obtain office, power, spoils and plunder. The Locofocos bought the Sun last year, and did not pay up. The Sun exposed them, and then sold itself to the Whigs for 'a consideration.' Since then the Locofocos have paid part and also bought the Sun for their party. The Sun thus pockets the money from both parties, and laughs at them for being such asses as to verify the proverb, 'fools and their money are soon parted.'"

Beach's retort appeared in the Sun next morning, beginning: "You need never expect courtesy or even decency from a born blackguard."

The struggle to abolish slavery in the Southern states had begun, the Sun becoming one of the chief champions of the abolitionists. Mr. Bennett carried the "war into Africa," so to speak, in his vigorous attacks on the Sun as the abolitionists' chief organ, terming it "The Nigger Penny Paper," and giving the following comical report of its circulation:

Circulation among abolitionists	1,000
Circulation among genteel niggers	500
Circulation among low niggers	400
Circulation among mulattoes	200
Circulation among bootblacks, etc.	100
Given away to the boys	1,000
Aggregate	3,200

Winding up his attack with the remark about the Sun being "a small, decrepit, dying paper."

Later, in reply to an extremely abusive article by Beach, in the Sun, he well nigh exhausted the vocabulary of forcible invectives, when he termed it:

"Our highly respected, dirty, sneaking, drivelling, negro contemporary, the Sun."

Both the Sun and the Herald at this time carried many columns of the most obnoxious patent medicine advertising, including announcements of the Female Vegetable Pills; Hunter's Red Drop; Jew David's or Hebrew Plaster, "unparalleled in its effects," while the card of the notorious Madame Restell appeared in both papers. All decency was thrown to the winds in the mad scramble for business.

The Switchboard Comes to Life

Zero hour approaches. Wire chief and assistants are set for the "cut-over" that will bring a new central office into being.

In the room above operators sit at the new switchboard. Two years this equipment has been building. It embodies the developments of hundreds of engineers and incorporates the scientific research of several decades. Now it is ready, tested in its parts but unused as an implement of service.

In the terminal room men stand in line before frames of myriad wires, the connections broken by tiny insulators. Midnight comes. A handkerchief is waved. The insulators are ripped from the frames. In a second the new switchboard becomes a thing alive. Without their knowledge thousands of subscribers are transferred from the old switchboard to the new. Even a chance conversation begun through the old board is continued without interruption through the new. The new exchange provides for further growth.

This cut-over of a switchboard is but one example, one of many engineering achievements that have made possible a wider and prompter use of the telephone.

To-day, in maintaining a national telephone service, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, through its engineering and research departments, continuously makes available for its Associated Companies improvements in apparatus and in methods of operation.

hen he said "Why should I divert any f our advertising appropriation from he national magazines to newspapers hen we are getting such excellent sup-ort from the newspapers all over the ountry?"

That's the story in a nut-shell gentle-ien, and when you get back home and again have a chance to sell a small 2 or 4 inch hook-up with a national campaign, just forget that you are selling a $1, $5 or $10 ad for your paper with the possible chance of net earning for your paper of 10c., 50c. or possibly $1 and think of the sales manager sitting at his desk in some distant city, like the sales manager of the Oregon Woolen Mills, and decide yourself whether you are big enough to do something for the newspapers or whether you want to be small enough to accept something for your own paper.

CHANGING FROM 12½ TO 12 EMS WITH NO TIME OR MATERIAL LOSS

By BRENT WILLIAMS

Director of Promotion and Publicity, St. Louis Post-Dispatch

THE program lists my subject as "The Advantages and the Disadvantages of ie 12-em column." However, the Post-Dispatch has found the advantages so any and the disadvantages so few that shall not attempt to classify or to umerate either, but merely give our perience.

Theoreticaly, taking a nonpareil from ch 12½-em column is a reduction of per cent but when we take into con-deration the fixed width of the seven lumn rules which divide the eight col-mns, the right and left margins, and e little burrs on the ends of linotype ugs, the saving is reduced to approxi-ately 3.4 per cent.

The Post-Dispatch formerly used 72 -inch, 52 ½-and 35-inch rolls. We w use 70, 52 ¾-inch and 36 ¼-inch, you see the theoretical 4 per cent in ality averages a trifle less than 3½ r cent.

Among other experiments made in con-dering the change was the resetting a page composed almost entirely of lid reading matter as it actually ap-ared in 12 ½-ems in a previous issue the Post-Dispatch, in the same type 12-em measure. We use a 7-point ce on an 8-point body. This experi-ent proved that there is only a negli-ble reduction in the amount of read-g matter. Actually, only eight lines ere left over when the page was re-t in the narrower measure. Utilizing e white space on short lines at the ds of paragraphs accounted for this.

The difference of a nonpareil per col-nn in the width of display advertise-ents, as any lay-out man or compositor hows, will not restrict either text or splay of the average advertisement.

Having established these two facts, de-rtment heads were consulted, the date ed and plans made for the change. otices were sent out to advertisers, te cards and contract forms were re-sed. This was virtually the extent our notice to the public.

The composing room, with eight weeks prepare for the change, reset in spare ne, all advertisements standing on ad-nce schedules, and as new schedules me in 12½-em measure was used for copy to be inserted before the change d 12-em for those that were to appear er the change.

Repeat ads—when the dates required th measures—were set twice—one for ch measure. We found most of the ctros or mats from agencies were eady on the 12-em basis, but when y were not, close trimming of the shoulders usually took care of the differ-ence. In other cases, where it could be done without loss of detail, the dry-mat method of shrinking was used, and in a few instances we made new plates in our own engraving department.

The Linotypes and Intertypes, all be-ing equipped with universal molds, re-quired only new liners, costing about a dollar each, to adapt them to the 12-em measure.

The necessary changes in chases, on the presses and in the stereotype depart-ment were taken care of entirely in our own machine shop. Steel fillers in the chases to compensate for the narrower measure were made, and the chases bored for screws. New trimmers were prepared for the cores of the autoplate casting boxes—ready to install.

These with the lowering of the saws made us ready to cast plates on the 12-em basis on a few minutes' notice.

On the presses it was only necessary to move the slitters and sheet formers in the folders. The center margin rings and end clips required no changes.

One of the most important things to consider in the change was our supply of paper in storage, in transit and in process of manufacture. The change was timed to enable us to make the shift without having a supply of the larger width rolls left over.

Two hours after the big Sunday issue of November 25, on a 12½-em basis, had been put to bed we had turned the entire production department to a 12-em basis and issued without a hitch a Sunday evening edition.

Where nobody loses and the publisher saves approximately 3½ per cent on white paper there seems to be but one answer.

Already more than 40 newspapers in the 20 largest cities have adopted the 12-em measure, and if the history of 12-em columns in St. Louis indicates the trend throughout the country another year will see nearly, if not all, of the larger newspapers using this standard measure.

The Post-Dispatch changed Nov. 26, 1923, the Globe-Democrat Jan. 15, 1924, the Star Feb. 11, 1924.

NEWSPAPERS MUST STANDARDIZE THEIR MERCHANDISING SERVICES

"A STANDARD merchandising service, adopted by all newspapers and adhered to strictly is the only solution to merchandising problem now confronting the press," D. F. McMahon, western national advertising manager of the Chicago Tribune told EDITOR & PUBLISHER at the annual meeting of newspaper advertising executives in Columbus, O., this week.

"Newspapers generally should draw up a concrete program of the service they will and will not give to national advertisers," McMahon said. "This program would then be sent to manufacturers and agency heads.

"The merchandising service given by many newspapers today is often far out of proportion to the lineage it brings. Requests for surveys from agencies are increasing in volume. Many of them are ridiculous in their requests, demanding a large expenditure of effort and money on the part of the newspaper.

"It is not the newspaper's province to sell goods, but to promote better and more advertising.

"The Chicago Tribune has adopted a policy prohibiting special surveys for individual products. We make general surveys only, not for one brand of goods, but equally useful for all. The same survey will serve any manufacturer in the same field.

"I am a strong advocate of a standardized merchandising service for newspapers."

PASSING OF THE COPY CHASER

By HARVEY YOUNG

Columbus Dispatch

The selling of advertising is rapidly being revolutionized. Progressive newspaper publishers and modern advertising managers are eliminating what has been slangily termed "the copy chaser."

Most all trades and professions require years of study and training. Even the typographical trade upon which we all must depend demands five years' apprenticeship. Yet some newspaper publishers and advertising managers are guilty of employing most anyone to sell advertising who has a good personal appearance and is willing to accept a small salary.

The time has arrived when we must show more appreciation of the value of training men to sell. We would not place our smallest newspaper press in charge of an unskilled mechanic. Yet some of us engage young men with little or no training to represent our publications, expecting them to go out and sell pages of valuable display space varying according to the publication from five cents to several dollars a line.

Inexperienced, incapable, indifferent, so-called salesmen are not only a handicap but a real liability to any newspaper. The general manager of a Chicago newspaper was recently quoted as saying that there was an annual turnover of 47 per cent in advertising salesmen. We all hope that he has been misquoted—because 47 per cent is startling. If such a condition prevailed on the newspaper I represent for one month, I would have my resignation in before the publisher beat me to it. You'll pardon any personal reference but I wish to say that there have been but three changes in the display department of our newspaper during the past eight years.

It is said that comparisons are odious—but I can't refrain from telling you that one of the well-known agency space buyers, who is also experienced in the local field, said: "The average local newspaper salesman does not measure up to the average salesman of magazine and trade paper advertising." If this is true, publishers and advertising managers are at fault. Too many of us underestimate in dollars the value of experienced and capable advertising salesmen. Magazine publishers select the cream, usually taking the top-notchers from the newspapers paying better salaries.

It is a mistake to encourage young men to enter advertising as a pastime or livelihood only, because advertising has become a profession of which any man who makes a success can well be proud. I remember an advertisement published by an agency in the New York Times last year headed: "More good people needed—a message to young men and women of the class of 1923." In part it said:

"If you want to take up advertising because you feel that you have as much sense as anyone you know in the business and can do as good work—stay clear of it. You probably won't get in at all and if you do, you won't get very far.

"If you want to go into advertising work because you think the work a little easier and hours shorter—keep away.

"If you want to enter advertising because you think it is a big and splendid business—full of opportunities—fine!

"The thing that makes young men study medicine and surgery that they may benefit mankind, the thing that causes vigorous, brilliant youths to enter church as a life work, the thing that makes young men strive to become efficient engineers, is the attitude toward the work they undertake.

"They have grasped the concept of real service and have seen in their chosen calling the pathway for the jubilant feet.

"If you can see advertising that way, you are needed—some way—somewhere."

No man was ever born a dentist. No man was ever born a salesman. It takes time, study and practice before one can extract molars or money painlessly. A man is only valuable as he has fitted himself to be.

Hugh Chalmers, one of the first great automobile manufacturers, and a friend of advertising, gave selling talks several years ago in which he described a large arch, representing salesmanship, built of stone blocks on each of which was a word pertaining to or connected with selling.

One block represented courtesy—another tact, and so on but the keystone block carried the word that should be the first factor, the first requirement, in all selling, whether it be a commodity or a service and that word was knowledge.

"Knowledge is education melted down into the button of experience."

Aristotle, the Greek philosopher, is quoted as saying, "to become an able man in any profession, there are three things necessary — nature — study — and practice."

Salesmen insult their profession when they attempt to interest anyone without a thorough knowledge of the prospect, his policies, his merchandise or service and a knowledge of their own proposition and the possibilities of increasing sales and good will through properly used space in the newspaper they represent.

You are more certain of increasing your advertising volume if you will but train your representative. Every daily newspaper, be it evening or morning, circulation 5,000 or 500,000, has a convincing selling story.

It is regrettable that more advertising men do not fully realize the value of advertising space in newspapers. They sell an advertiser a full page at an average rate of but ½ to ⅓ of a cent per family reached, which means an advertiser can place a full page message into the home at the cost of ⅓ of a cent as against a whole cent for a postal card.

Surely every one, be he a buyer or seller of space, recognizes that the full page advertisement in the newspaper has far more value than the postal card and you can secure three full pages, three different days at the cost of the postal one time.

The postal has no editorial policy—no prestige—no magnetism—offers no co-operation to the advertiser—whereas the newspaper presents all of these.

If an advertiser sends out a piece of direct-by-mail, a telegram or uses the telephone to solicit business and does not get it, he never thinks of blaming the telegraph company, the postal authorities or the telephone company and yet we permit him to blame our publication for lack of results.

One of the most successful directors of advertising salesmen, now the head of a great New York newspaper, recently said this to his advertising staff:

"When advertisers tell you their advertising isn't paying or your paper is not pulling, don't be discouraged.

"If all advertising paid at once, the mills could not produce enough white paper to supply the demand.

"Advertising is based on business and business is often a failure. If you'll but note the failures in any given line over a period of seven years, you will understand that business often fails with and without the assistance of advertising.

"How then can advertising be a sure success when based on something that is mostly a failure."

"The best advertising in all the world can't make a successful business man out of a boob—and the weakest kind of advertising never denied a good business man progress."

Confidence in the advertising business should be just as vital as it is in the banking business. Summed up it is simply faith in others and when that faith is shaken, disaster follows.

ROMANCE A MAJOR COMPONENT OF GLOBE-DEMOCRAT COPY

By DOUGLAS V. MARTIN, Jr.

Manager of Publicity, St. Louis Globe-Democrat

I LIKE to think that it was the advertising man who first discovered the romance in business. I know that he is the one who has made it his task to search out the interesting and dramatic facts of business around which to build new and greater enterprises.

He is the one who has brought linoleum out of the kitchen to beautify parlor floors. He is the one who has demonstrated to us all that the little cake of yeast can do more than raise bread dough. He is the one who has lifted the cloak of opprobrium from the alarm clock, and made of that instrument a friendly, helpful companion.

He can take oil or rubber, paper or leather, coffee or gum; and out of those apparently prosaic materials he can draw inspiration for masterpieces of sales literature.

Results?

You know the results. They show in dividends—big dividends reflecting increased sales and expanded business.

And now I am going to specialize. I want to tell you how the Globe-Democrat is employing the power of advertising in its own behalf, in behalf of St. Louis, in behalf of those other advertisers the world over who entrust their campaigns to its columns.

The Globe-Democrat, like other newspaper, has, primarily, two things to sell: To the advertiser we sell white space. To the reader we sell printed columns—news, features, editorials, cartoons, fiction.

First of all, there is the editorial department, with its news and features, to be sold to the public. Closely linked with the editorial department is the circulation department. The advertising in behalf of these two departments must be directed to the reading public.

On the other hand, we have those departments which sell the white space to advertisers.

They are:

1. The Local Advertising Department,
2. The Foreign Advertising Department,
3. The Classified Advertising Department.

We must support these departments with advertising which tells of the prestige and widespread influence of the Globe-Democrat—which tells of the power of this newspaper as an advertising medium.

In order to serve all these departments the Globe-Democrat established still another—a department of publicity, designed to tell the story of this newspaper to the world—through advertising.

The department of publicity is analogous to an advertising agency, serving several "clients." These "clients" are the other departments of the Globe-Democrat.

And how do we advertise these departments?—What advertising policy have we adopted?

The obvious and old-fashioned policy would have been one of boastful claims.

We studied the problem and decided upon a broader policy. The average person outside our organization is not particularly interested in us to begin with, except insofar as we offer him a service.

We try in our advertising to sell our customers on the service which the Globe-Democrat will render them.

If we are trying to win new readers, we advertise the advantages of reading news early in the morning, when the mind is fresh. We show how our special features help readers to a better understanding of the problems of housekeeping, care of the automobile, selection of clothes, maintenance of health, etc., etc.

Satisfied Subscribers

is the result all Circulation Departments strive after.

This result is certain, and easy to effect, when The Multi-Mailer System is used in the upkeep and addressing of the mail list.

Complaint was made at the recent meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors that the cost of selling newspaper features was a considerable element in the price of this portion of the newspaper's expense.

The copy service which the Church Advertising Department offers newspapers is loaded with no personal selling expense. This weekly announcement in EDITOR AND PUBLISHER is our only way to reach newspaper advertising managers—and this space is donated by the paper.

Our only desire in life is to see churches make larger use of various forms of helpful publicity. We believe that they can use newspapers largely and that newspapers can show the churches the way this advertising can best be done.

The price for exclusive use of copy averages four dimes a week. We have other copy which is free to all papers.

Or, in lighter vein, we star comic favorites.

If we are tackling the problem of winning advertisers, we tell them how to build business—a more interesting message to any space buyer than a mere recountal of dull circulation figures and line rates.

For instance, back in 1921 we undertook to help reliable investment houses sell the public on the advantage of bonds. Twice each week we ran, over our own name, a good sized advertisement, emphasizing the value of bonds, and urging our readers to deal with substantial investment houses.

We said very little about the Globe-Democrat in these ads. Only this:

"Seek Sound Advice
Consultation with reliable investment houses will save you money and earn you money. An excellent guide is to be found in the financial advertisements in the

GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
(With its real Financial Pages)

In order to protect its readers, the Globe-Democrat investigates, as carefully as possible, the integrity of every investment house advertising in its columns."

We kept faith.

We kept our columns clean—free from the advertising of wild-cat organizations. In one year we have turned down as much as $50,000 worth of questionable investment advertising.

The public listened. The investment houses listened. The public learned to look for high class investments on the financial pages of the Globe-Democrat. The investment houses found their business increasing by leaps and bounds. One of our advertisers wrote us that our campaign had helped him increase his sales 300 per cent.

Our campaign is still running—one advertisement each week urging sound investment.

We have put a portfolio, containing proofs of the advertisement which we have run in our own columns, into the hands of investment houses throughout the country.

When we looked about us for a big idea upon which to base our main advertising effort, we decided that, in order to build sound business for the Globe-Democrat, we must build business for St. Louis.

Bring big factories and warehouses and sales organizations to a city, and every one in that city is benefited.

So we undertook to advertise St. Louis—the city and community.

Along the Pennsylvania Railway, just out of New York, we leased a battery of painted bulletins.

On these bulletins, visible to 110,000 passengers a day, we have spread the message of St. Louis' dominance.

And, subordinated to the main message, we add, as a post script:

"Globe-Democrat, St. Louis' Largest Daily."

Do you see the psychology of it?

Imagine the pride felt by a St. Louisan, far from home, as he sees his own city so strikingly advertised.

Imagine the effect upon the travelers from other cities—the advertiser in New York, the big manufacturer from Detroit which, to me, is the most interesting of all.

And now the phase of our advertising—the man from San Francisco.

The Globe-Democrat has added a new state to the Union.

It may not show on your map, but it is there just the same. It does show on a map which I hope to give to each one of you when I close my remarks in a few minutes. In studying the situation in the St. Louis newspaper field, we discovered a remarkable fact.

Here was St. Louis—the hub of a remarkable market—one of the richest in the whole world.

A city with 26 railroads entering its gates. A city on the banks of the Father of Waters. A city with nearly a dozen electric lines radiating into the wealthy manufacturing agricultural districts of Missouri and Illinois.

A city with hard surfaced roads bearing automobile traffic from throughout the country—and this city the mecca.

We investigated the circulation records of the Globe-Democrat in the territory surrounding St. Louis.

And we found that this one newspaper was the one big influence of the district.

As one writer, in a recent article in The National Geographic Magazine has said—"to tens of thousands" throughout this district "The Globe Democrat is guide, philosopher and friend."

The 49th State we call it. It's a circle radius 150 miles. The population exceeds 4½ millions. It has more resources than any other state can show.

The 49th State comprises sections of five states—Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas.

And we are advertising this 49th State. We've taken the principal towns one by one. We've found out their principal resources. We've tabulated their retail outlets. So many grocers, so many druggists, so many hardware stores, so many auto dealers, etc., etc.

We've prepared a series of advertisements each reproducing a view of the down town section in a given town, and then telling of its market possibilities.—And we've shown how the Globe-Democrat serves each of these towns as no other metropolitan paper does.

Here is a book which is based upon nearly two years' work in research and compilation. The story of this book and the investigation upon which it is founded would require several hours for the telling.

This is the work of one of the leading advertising agencies in the country—a dispassionate survey of St. Louis and the 49th State, seeking information as to the real preferences of the people regarding newspapers; seeking accurate knowledge of this market—the division of population and purchasing power; the percentage of home ownership; the distribution of automobiles; the location of native white—page after page of authentic—absolutely authentic—information regarding this market.

The survey was made by specially trained workers, who called upon 110,000 homes and obtained 80,797 effective interviews.—Probably the most comprehensive analysis of circulation and reading habits ever made for an American newspaper.

It is difficult to conceive of the magnitude of this undertaking. A new department—The Research Division—has had to be created at the Globe-Democrat—to take care of the records, and to carry on the work which the survey has made possible. Ballot counting machines have had to be installed to enable this department to collate and appraise the mass of data for the benefit of our advertisers.

And just lately this book went out to advertisers throughout the world to carry the news of the survey.

Full page advertisements in the metropolitan newspapers have told of the revelations in this book and have offered it to interested executives.

We've linked St. Louis and its tributary towns inseparably. The people in those very towns have become interested in our campaign. They have felt the compliment of seeing the names and pictures of those towns published broadcast with remarks as to their importance in the community.

And we at the Globe-Democrat have felt the good effect. The St. Louis Chamber of Commerce has asked for copies of our portfolio to display to business men seeking information on the St. Louis market.

Mind you, we have planned our own campaign to reinforce a somewhat smaller one which the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce is running.

We've tried to link the two together—for the glory of St. Louis—and the Globe-Democrat.

You'll hear interesting things from The 49th State. It's a most remarkable commonwealth. . . . The more we study it the bigger it seems.

And if you motor down to St. Louis, this summer, you'll see along the road, giant bulletin boards, reproducing the map of The 49th State, and telling you more about it. You'll know when you reach The 49th State.

YOUR INDIANA MARKET

Gives You a Potential Market Unsurpassed

ALTHOUGH great pioneering projects in industry, trade and agriculture are still being carried forward in Indiana, this state belongs to that group, to which natural endowments have given the mark of established stability.

Indiana's first great wealth came from its farms, and agriculture still plays an important part in its trade life. Other natural resources, such as timber, oil, gas and coal have also contributed to the buying power of the people of the state.

The industrial growth of the state is the natural result of superior transportation facilities. No state is better supplied in this respect. It is in the pathway of almost all of the great trunk lines and branch railroads tap every part of the state.

Indiana is a state of good, live towns only a few miles apart. This state, ninth in point of population, has twelve cities with over 25,000 people. It has the highest native born population of all the states, with over 92 per cent.

Any national advertising campaign must include Indiana. It is right in the heart of things—commercially and geographically.

The newspapers of Indiana offer you the best means of reaching this market, all of them substantial, enterprising papers, highly thought of by their readers and advertisers.

Secure a firm foothold with these leading daily newspapers.

METHODS OF OBTAINING AND DEVELOPING LOCAL DISPLAY SALESMAN

By W. E. DONOHUE
Local Display Manager, Chicago Tribune

NEARLY every executive in the advertising department of the Chicago Tribune, even to the advertising manager, has come up through the ranks from a "want ad solicitor." Thus, we are able to attract to our doors young men from all walks of life seeking an opportunity to sell advertising space. It rarely becomes necessary for us to advertise for men because with the close of each high school year or college year we have hundreds of applications from young men who have decided that they want to follow the advertising business and want to start on the Tribune.

Usually these men are interviewed by our classified manager and if they, in his judgment, measure up to the standard, they are given an application blank. Maybe, immediately, or at some future date, the candidate is started either on the front counter accepting want ads from the public, or is given, after a few days' training, what is known as a cash territory—usually far removed from the downtown district and the young man is instructed to stay within it and get all of the want ads that he can on a cash basis only.

If an advertiser telephones and wants to place a cash ad that lead is turned over to this particular salesman, clippings of ads appearing from his territory from other newspapers are also furnished him as leads, and he is supposed to canvass the rooming houses, boarding houses, hotels, real estate offices, etc. If he shows ability he is moved from one territory to another until he earns his way to a downtown territory, then as the vacancies occur he is moved from the cash department into the charge department and does practically the same work as before, starting in an outlying district calling on those who have yearly contracts, rendering service to them and trying to convert any businesses that are using the paper on a cash basis to contract advertisers.

During all of this time in the classified department he receives certain literature about the Tribune, its policies and its methods. He is given a certain amount of instruction as to how advertising copy should be written and handled, and after a year or more of training, if a vacancy occurs, he is then sent to the local display manager for an interview, competing probably with from 6 to 12 other men for the position.

It may be surprising to you to learn that the man turnover in the classified department is large. If the candidate after two interviews with the local display manager does not measure up to the standard demanded by him, the candidate is advised to seek his fortune elsewhere—in other words, he is fired.

There are certain factors taken into consideration when he appears before the local manager, heredity, education, environment, observation powers, personal appearance, and the success that he has made as a classified solicitor. Subtle questions are put to him at the interview. His method of approach, his handshake, are the first things that are noted along with his personal appearance and expressions, that is, the things that he says and the way that he says them. He is questioned as to the schools he attended. A lineup is gotten on his inherent characteristics and the environment he started life in, and the things he has done to improve that environment up to the present time.

Questions are asked to test his observation powers on the newspaper itself, its management and policy—on its pyramid style of makeup, editorial policies and the editorial features, as well as of his knowledge of display advertising and the concerns who are large users of space in a display way, and the specific days that these large users of space run copy. Then a question is put as to the application of the knowledge he has acquired. In Chicago certain popular priced department stores do not use the daily morning papers, but are large users of Sunday space. Certain types of women's wear stores of a cheaper grade are large users of Sunday space and do not use daily morning papers.

Others stores such as Marshall Field and Carson, Pirie Scott & Company do not use Sunday papers. All of this information is included in a Book of Facts, a copy of which is given to each employe each year, or at the time he enters the employ of the paper. So the question might be put in this way: If you were employed in the local display advertising department and the telephone rang on your desk and Mr. Goldberg who conducts a cloak and suit store of a cheaper grade were to tell you that he had 1,000 coats that he wanted to sell for $12.50 and asked you to get up an advertisement—what size advertisement would you recommend and what day of the week would you suggest that he place that advertisement and why? His answer would indicate whether or not he had studied and absorbed the Book of Facts.

If the young man is selected for the position, in a few days he is placed on the local payroll. He is then put through a system of sales training lasting about ten days, during which time a course of home study is outlined for him. He is then assigned to a trained local solicitor and changed each day so that he can get an entire training on all classes of local business. This usually takes from two to three weeks and at the end of a month he is placed in charge of the accounts and is assigned certain prospects, and is usually given a six months' trial to make good. This ten days' verbal instruction received from the local display manager is outlined as follows:

He is taught the 4 big requisites for successful selling. These are, he must sell himself—his personality—the house he represents and the contents of that house. Ramifications of these 4 major points are gone into in detail. The faults in his method of approach are pointed out and instruction is given on how to correct them. He is warned against a stereotyped method of approach. He is instructed to be a positive salesman, not a negative one. He is instructed in the use of the yardstick to test whether or not an advertising campaign will be successful. This yardstick is as follows: Is the medium right, the time proper, the copy right, the merchandise right, the management of the proposition right? The 5 points are covered in detail. He is schooled in the testing of the inherent qualities of his prospective customer, thus being instructed to fit himself into the customer's scheme of things. He is expected at the end of each day's training to recite the things that he learned that day, thus giving him confidence to talk on his feet. He is usually trained with two or three other salesmen.

Sales problems are given him and a sales resistance by a fellow solicitor is placed against him, thus teaching him when to recognize a point of contact and the course to pursue in order to dominate from that point of contact so that he might carry the conversation to a successful sale. He is impressed with the importance of study because he cannot sell the house he represents unless he knows it and believes in it and radiates it—and he cannot sell the contents of that house unless he understands it—therefore he is given a great deal of instruction on the makeup of local advertising, the city of Chicago and the 5 central states; and a working knowledge of the news writers and the features appearing in the newspaper, as well as the mechanical, editorial, auditing, circulation and manufacturing departments. He is taught what circulation figures mean and how to analyze them. He is impressed with the fact that knowledge is power only when it is properly disseminated.

He is instructed in the who, what, when, where, why and how rules of salesmanship. He is schooled in the buying and selling of merchandise, the wholesale market, the jobbing market, the markup, and turnover of merchandise, and in retail store service and management. Also how to compare his merchandise, that is, the newspaper that he represents with that of his contemporaries. He learns not only his own rates but the rates of other newspapers. He is warned never to oversell and to realize that after all the man that pays his salary is really the merchant whose advertising he solicits. He is advised against exaggerated statements in order to sell a client, because by bad advice while he may gain temporary lineage he may kill a permanent advertiser. He is instructed to be truthful in his statements, be honest with himself, the house he represents, and the merchant on whom he calls. When he is released from this school he has access to the office of the local manager or his assistant for any information that he may seek, and then two or three times a week he sits in with a group of solicitors, at which time important sales talks and sales instructions are given. He is impressed with the importance of team work and warned against individualism.

In these meetings at times he is called to give talks on his experiences or seek advice of his fellows on problems that confront him. Usually his accounts are a diversified line when first assigned, and if he shows a particular ability for certain lines, such as furniture, men's wear or women's wear, musical instrument etc., when a vacancy occurs on these group accounts he is selected to handle that particular branch of the business entirely.

I, as Local Manager, am able to give this kind of training because having come up through the ranks myself and having worked in the editorial, auditing, circulation, and mechanical departments, as well as the advertising department of newspapers.

Texas Daily Loses Damage Suit

Former Chief of Police Fred Lancaster of San Antonio, Texas, has been given verdict for $15,000 damages against the San Antonio Express in District Court at San Antonio. Lancaster sued for $50,000. The action was based upon three articles printed in the Express in December, 1917, in which city and county officials were urged to enforce the vice laws.

Hundreds stand in line in Philadelphia to buy the Sunday Transcript. This is not true as to any other publication on earth. Seventy-five years without soliciting an advertisement.

London Office—Hastings House, 10, Norfolk Street, Strand, W. C. 2

Bush House, London, for New Yorkers:—In addition to making Bush House the Convention Registration Headquarters in London, it is intended to continue the tenancy to July 22, and it is hoped to arrange headquarters offices there for the New York Advertising Club, the Houston delegation, the New England contingent, and the American advertising agents. The ground floor reserved has an area of nearly 6,000 square feet, and in the building are two American banks, the Guaranty Trust Company and the Equitable Trust Company, and two cable companies, Western Union and Commercial Code.

Sir Charles Starmer's Interest:—Sir Charles W. Starmer, who controls one of the largest groups of Provincial newspapers, as well as the London Westminster Gazette, has contributed £500 to the convention fund and in addition will make a special contribution to the Sheffield entertainment fund.

Other contributors include the proprietors of the Bolton Evening News, with £250; Sir Robert H. H. Baird, of the Belfast Telegraph, with £100; H. J. Heinz (57 Varieties) and Boots' Pure Drug Company, each with fifty guineas.

France Wants to Be In It:—Ferand A. Marteau, Hon, Sec. of the British Overseas Committee, reports that France is expected to be prominently represented in the Convention. According to hotel reservation made, more than 900 delegates are coming, including 2 advertising women. At the banquet to French-speaking delegates, M. Paul Dupuy, proprietor of the Petite Parisien has promised to speak. One session, as part of the Export Departmental, will be held in the French language.

Five hundred American delegates are to be welcomed to Paris after the Convention, and a comprehensive program of hospitality is being arranged. It is pointed out by Mr. Marteau that although this invitation to the American delegates has been extended by the Association of the French Press, provision will be made to enable any American group of specific interests to meet leading French advertising men possessing similar interests. The Paris trip will be a great time for hotel proprietors, railways and automobile houses are cooperating to give of their best.

Little Lines of Action:—The Great Western Railway has offered free transport for 250 delegates to Oxford and Stratford-on-Avon (Shakespeare's Home) and will entertain the passengers to dinner on the train.

The Publicity Club of Edinburgh has applied for affiliation to the A. A. C. W. A. Adeler, the Norwegian delegate to the Convention, who is president of the Norwegian Advertising Agents' Association and general manager of Heroldens Annoncebureau, Christiania, has been nominated to the Legion of Honor.

I understand that J. Murray Allison is the new advertisement manager of Allied Newspapers Ltd. the Berry group of papers taken over from Messrs. E. Hulton & Co. Ltd., and including the Manchester Daily Dispatch, Evening Chronicle, Sunday Chronicle and Empire News.

At the convention luncheon, May 27, C. Harold Vernon welcomed Muelen Dyke, of the New York Advertising Club, as the first American delegate to arrive in London.

The Ulster delegation to the Convention will be housed at the Hotel Great Central (Marylebone terminal); the French delegates have made reservations at the same hotel and at the Hotel Russell.

PICTURE TRANSMISSION RECORDS

Telephone Wires and Airplanes Used to Relay Photos from Cleveland

Transmission of pictures by telephone and airplane was a feature this week of the National Republican Convention, Cleveland. While the American Telephone and Telegraph Company flooded New York newspapers with photographs brought over telephone wires by their new method, picture agencies vied with one another for speed using airplanes.

One record was claimed by United News pictures, when a flashlight picture taken in Cleveland was dropped by parachute to a waiting navy speed boat in New York harbor, and was in the office of the New York World, within 5 hours. Airplanes were also used in transporting pictures to Chicago and other cities.

A. A. C. W. Vanguard Off for Britain

As vanguard to 2,000 American advertising delegates to the international convention, A. A. C. W., Wembley, July 13 to 18, Harry Tipper, chairman of the program committee, and Earl Pearson, secretary, sailed for England Thursday on the S. S. President Roosevelt. John H. Logeman, of Chicago, chairman of the exhibit committee, was also in the party. He goes to complete arrangements for the American advertising exhibition to be set up in the Wembley stadium. Establishment of American headquarters in London, and final ironing out of program matters are the chief reasons for the advance trip to London.

HEARST PLANS N. Y. TABLOID

Rumors Persist and Officials Won't Deny Them—Has Equipment Ready

While Hearst officials seemed bent on keeping plans secret, rumor this week persisted that a new morning illustrated tabloid newspaper, the Star, flying the Hearst banner, would be established in New York shortly.

Rumors set the date for the first issue at June 16.

Efforts to obtain confirmation or denial of reports were unsuccessful. A high official, refusing use of his name, declined to deny the rumor, declaring that "anything was likely to happen in an organization as large as Hearst's in New York."

Arthur Brisbane, it was learned, was not in Cleveland June 10 or 11, and gossip immediately connected his presence in New York with establishment of the tabloid.

It is known that Mr. Hearst owns sufficient equipment in New York for immediate publication of such a daily. Organization of a staff, and completion of distribution arrangements remain to be completed.

Equipment is housed in the Hearst auxiliary plant on Gold street, near the American building. Tabloid presses there were used once before, when a tabloid section was added to the regular morning editions of the New York American.

Columbia Honors Three Journalists

Columbia University, New York, on June 4, awarded honorary degrees of Doctor of Laws to Victor F. Lawson, publisher of the Chicago Daily News; Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the New York Times; and Melville E. Stone, counselor of the Associated Press. On June 3, they were guests at the annual commencement dinner of Nicholas Murray Butler president of Columbia. Other newspaper men at the dinner were Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York World, and H. H. Kohlsaat, former editor of the old Chicago Inter Ocean.

PICTURESQUE SPOTS IN HISTORIC LONDON

Gog and Magog. City Guardian genii who changed their names. Last of the Giants.

One on each side of the great west window of the Guildhall stand Gog and Magog, the gigantic guardian genii of the City of London.

They are carved in wood, and richly coloured. Each is over fourteen feet in height.

The one on your left is Gog. He is girt with a sword, and has a bow and a quiver of arrows slung behind him. But his main armament is a "morning star."

This instrument, which he holds in his right hand, consists of an iron ball studded with spikes, hanging by a chain from the end of a long pole, a truly formidable weapon.

Magog carries a long pike, shield and sword, and wears armour of the Roman type.

These solid and enduring images were carved in the year 1707 by Captain Richard Saunders, of King street, to take the place of predecessors of a much lighter construction. Before this time it was customary for the two giants to be taken each year from the hall and carried in the Lord Mayor's procession. They were consequently hollow affairs of wicker and pasteboard.

How long ago they were first connected with the civic pageantry of London we do not know. But they seem to have been well established by the time of Henry V., whom they greeted at the end of London Bridge on his triumphal return after Agincourt.

It is a curious thing that they now have the name of only one of them shared between them. The name of the one now known as Gog was originally "Gogmagog" and the other was "Corineus."

The latter was the companion—or brother—of Brut, the leader of the

Gog and Magog

Britons when they first settled in this "Isle of Albion."

He subdued and tamed Gogmagog, the last of the giants who inhabited this land before that time.

The mistake doubtless occurred through a confusion of the name "Gogmagog" with the "Gog and Magog" mentioned in the books of Ezekiel and Revelation.

DOLLAR PULLERS

Advertising and circulation managers are always on the lookout for new ideas that will increase advertising receipts and win new circulation. Your idea for increasing advertising or circulation may not appeal to your manager, but it may be just the thing that some other manager wants. EDITOR & PUBLISHER will pay $1 for each idea printed under this head. The fact that the idea is now being used in your city does not bar it from the department. Address your communication to the DOLLAR PULLER EDITOR. When they appear clip them and mail them in and receive payment. Unavailable ideas will not be returned.

A LARGE line drawing of a modern car with lines running to small display ads all around proved a good special feature for one paper recently. Each space brought $50 and was sold to an advertiser or dealer of some sort of equipment for the car.—James M. Mosely, 39 East Concord street, Boston.

Every year in recent years has seen a considerable increase of interest in horse riding. Get up stories about the local increase in interest in this sport and work for advertising among local riding academies, harness dealers, renters of saddle horses, dealers in riding habits, etc.—Frank H. Williams, 411½ North Main street, Sana Ana, Cal.

An industrial feature aimed at manufacturers who rarely advertise in local papers brought results. The plan followed out was to get a manufacturer take space on the industrial page for a certain number of issues. The news department then detailed a reporter to go through the plant and get an industrial news story.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

The Santa Ana (Cal.) Register wraps all its papers which are delivered by carrier boys with wire so that the papers are tight and yet not broken and are in the best possible condition when received by the subscribers.—Frank H. Williams, 411½ North Main street, Santa Ana, Cal.

One of the easiest double pages we have ever sold was one using the word "WHERE." This word occupied about 3 columns by 5 inches deep in the center of the top part of the pages. Around the word "Where" were six question marks. At the top of each ad was "Can I Buy," "Can I Get," or "Can I Find," depending upon the body of the advertisement which was all written in this office. For the garage man we wrote "Can I Get My Car Repaired?" and so on for other merchants. For this page we had but four refusals out of 38 calls.—R. Kenneth Kerr, Wilmington (Ohio) Daily News.

Ad departments miss good guesses every day by not watching national ad schedules. Take music record releases. A series of line ads from merchants could be secured for a run under the ad. Then in clothing, tire and other ads, boxes containing ads from local merchants may be secured if it is pointed out that the merchant enjoys the benefit of the larger ad merely by inserting a small name ad under the foreign ad.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

The summer touring and camping is about to start. As soon as it is well under way try a special page feature headed "The Summer Tourists' Extra." Devote the center of the page to stories on improvements being made or planned for the camp, auto tires that have given unusual mileage, makes of cars that have crossed the country without mechanical trouble, family ideas of equipment necessary for camping convenience, yarns of hairbreadth escapes on the road, attempted holdups, sketches of men at the camp of national importance, persons, etc. This opens up an endless channel of advertising. All garages will carry a permanent space. Business houses selling tents, cots, camp stools, cooking utensils, etc., will be interested. Agencies for tires and cars will jump at the chance to run a big ad whenever a favorable story regarding their product is to appear. In fact a double truck ought to be necessary in any large city offering a municipal camp ground to tourists.—Fred E. Beane, Manchester (N. H.) Union-Leader.

ALL MILWAUKEE PAPERS CLAIM NEW READERS

First Week of Sentinel Operation by W. R. Hearst Sees Shift in Store Copy—Report Berger Will Sell

MILWAUKEE, June 9.—That a morning newspaper will be launched by the publishers of the Milwaukee Journal, not later than August 1, is the latest presistent rumor here, following the shake-up incident to change of control of the Sentinel. The Journal denies the reports.

Announcement was made during the week that Judge August C. Backus is to retire from the bench to become publisher of The Milwaukee Sentinel. The announcement named four prominent Milwaukeeans, including Charles Pfister, former owner of the Sentinel, as associated with Judge Backus as directors in the company publishing the Sentinel. The announcement omitted mention of ownership.

The Morning Sentinel is being put out with a somewhat modified form of Hearst morning paper make-up. Arthur Brisbane's "Today" appears regularly on page one in the regular position. Back of page one, the Sentinel has dropped much of its former conservative makeup and adopted more of the Hearst style. The society page, for instance, is made up in standard Hearst morning paper style. The Sentinel, however, has not gone in for a solid page of comics and has thus far, stuck to one "first" page. The better known of the Hearst morning comics are scattered throughout the paper.

Several days during the week, the Morning Sentinel carried a full page announcement that in acquiring control of the Sunday Milwaukee Telegram, the Sentinel company automatically acquired first option on the Hearst morning paper features.

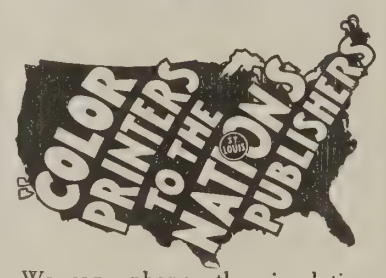
It is understood from an authoritative source that during the week, the circulation of the morning paper increased from approximately 39,000 to around 46,000 net. The press run on the Sunday paper yesterday was 196,000. The Sunday edition of the Journal reports a press run of 146,214 last Sunday against a press run of 131,164 a week ago. The evening edition of the Journal on Friday last claimed a press run of 138,703 against an average of 131,590 for the week before the consolidation of the Wisconsin News and the Evening Sentinel. The Wisconsin News claims to be running around 112,000 against 89,000 before the consolidation.

It is reported that the Sentinel has cancelled its contract for the New York Times leased wires effective June 10 and that after that date Universal Service (the Hearst night wire) will have two leased wires serving the morning edition of the Sentinel. From the same sources it is said that the Journal is negotiating with the Times for leased wire service. The Journal now has United News and New York World service for its "sunrise" edition which does not circulate in the city.

During the week, is was announced that the Journal had engaged the services of A. L. Harvey, formerly city editor of the Evening Sentinel; Fred Sheasby, formerly political writer for the Sentinel and Manning Vaughan, formerly sporting editor.

The advertising situation, so far as concerns department stores, is interesting. Prior to the consolidation, the Journal and Wisconsin News were running full copy from the three leading department stores and the Sentinels were running greatly reduced copy. All last week, the Wisconsin News-Evening Sentinel combination had only part copy from the same stores, despite the larger press run and circulation.

Also, the day the combination went effect, the street car boxes, from wl Milwaukee car riders in the morning been obtaining Morning Sentinels appeared from the cars. Charles Pf former owner of the Sentinels, is lar interested in the street car company, said.



Another rumor which is going rounds is that Congressman Victor ger, is negotiating with the Scri Howard newspapers, with a view transferring to them the Milwa Leader, the socialist daily he owns. Leader is served by United Press. It a practically new plant, well equipped adequate for considerable growth. Le employees profess to know nothing of Scripps-Howard report. Berger i Washington.

NINE N. Y. PAPERS GAINED IN MAY, THOUGH TOTAL SHOWS LOSS

TINE out of 13 New York and Brooklyn newspapers printed more advertising in May, 1924, than in the same month of 1923, according to measurements of the New York Evening Post Statistical Department. Four papers showed losses which totaled 326,162 lines, while the gains of the nine other papers totaled 160,628 lines. Yet the loss for the month against the May, 1923, total was 107,556 lines, due to suspension during that year of the Herald, Globe, and Mail, whose combined total last May was 2,342,-112 lines.

Superficially, it would appear that advertisers have cut from their schedules almost a million and a half lines of advertising as a result of the year's consolidations. Allowing 2,300 lines to a page, the decrease in lineage totals 612 pages. The actual decrease in number of pages printed was the difference between 14,582 last year and 13,398 this May—1,184, of which the loss in advertising accounted for 51 per cent. The total lineage for May, 1924, and May, 1923, are 13,938,118 agate lines and 15,345,674 lines, respectively.

Comparative totals for May, 1924-1923, and 1924-1918, follow:

Iowa Enjoys the Highest Per Capita of Wealth and the Lowest Percentage of Illiteracy

This condition is permanent because her wealth is based on agriculture.

The approximate value of farm products and live stock products each year in Iowa amounts to the enormous sum of

$1,750,000,000

Iowa's progressive people are mainly engaged in intensive agricultural pursuits.

Nature stands back of Iowa each year. Every acre is fertile. Iowa has never known a crop failure.

The average value of farm land per acre is $254.00. Iowa has no congested sections. There are no "good" sections and "ordinary" sections. It is all good.

This means that money pours into Iowa banks and her people's pockets, giving Iowa more banks than any other state.

These facts are reflected in that Iowa has a higher percentage of literates than any other state, she has more farm-owned automobiles and more telephones per capita than any other state.

An advertising appropriation, judiciously divided among Iowa's dominating newspapers listed below, can be made to pay a substantial dividend.

ROGERS PLANS A NEW EVENING DAILY

Former New York Globe Publisher and Editor Announces Venture As Unique Experiment in Journalism

A new evening newspaper for New York, "established in the same manner as a public library," forming a "unique experiment in journalism," was promised by Jason Rogers, former publisher of the New York Globe, this week, if the public indicates it wants such a newspaper.

To ascertain the public mind, Mr. Rogers published a full page advertisement in Tuesday's New York Times, requesting persons interested to return a coupon to his headquarters in the old Tribune Building. In the advertisement the proposal was outlined.

Rumors had long been current that Mr. Rogers intended re-entering the New York newspaper field at the head of a daily. In the advertisement, he said that thousands had requested him to do this.

"No definite plans regarding a plant have been made," Rogers declared in a statement given EDITOR & PUBLISHER. "I do not intend to start the new newspaper until after the election excitement is over. I already have substantial support pledged, and when sufficient capital for an assured success is in hand we shall start."

The date, he said, will probably be in the late fall or about January 1, 1925. The paper may be printed up-town, with possible branches in Brooklyn and the Bronx to reduce delivery costs, he stated.

"The capital necessary will be raised by subscription to bonds, upon which interest will be paid up to 7 per cent when earned," Rogers' statement continued. "Control will be in a small issue of common stock, a majority of which will be held by trustees, men who command the respect and confidence of the community. Dividends will be limited to 7 per cent and those earned on the trusteed stock will constitute a bonus fund to be distributed among the employes of the newspaper."

Advertising rates, Mr. Rogers' statement reads, under no circumstances shall exceed cost, plus a sufficient profit to pay the limited dividend.

Mr. Rogers described his proposed daily as one that will be "neither a temporary personal organ nor a mere business enterprise, but a solidly established institution devoted singly to the public service, secure against capture by private wealth and the natural vicissitudes of life."

Henry J. Wright, editor of the Globe for many years, and who recently resigned from the New York Sun as executive editor, will be editor of the new daily, if demand of the public justifies its establishment.

Others now associated with Mr. Rogers in preliminary work are W. E. Severn, one time advertising manager of the New York Herald, and A. S. King.

Mr. Rogers said: "We will not seek the 'largest circulation,' but make a newspaper better, bigger and more complete than the Globe was and depend upon such meritorious production as we can make to win substantial recognition from a public grown out of patience with personally conducted newspapers for profit. Judged by early returns the public wants such a newspaper. That it will be a success if started is assured, for the organization I will bring together is bound to make a go of the venture."

Later, in a lengthy formal statement, Mr. Rogers declared that "recent consolidations of newspapers" in single hands and one-man ownership of more than one newspaper "have raised questions touching the integrity of a free press. The constitutional guarantee was framed under conditions simpler than those that exist today. Newspapers owed their influence to their ability to command attention. That ability resided in their editors, preservation of whose right to publish the news and their opinions was clearly in the public interest. However powerful they might become in the exercise of this right was of no public concern.

"With the growth of great cities and mechanical devices for rapid publication of newspapers, the character of our press began to change," he said. "Merchants had been learning the advantage of crying their wares in its pages. Capital had been learning how much was paid for the privilege. Wealth that had gone into journalism for recognition and power, rarely with success, now turned to it as a congenial source of more wealth.

"The profession of journalism had become a business. With the change in object, came a change in practice. Profit being the first consideration, nothing that might endanger it was tolerated. Everything that would increase the money return became desirable. For rivalry of brains and emulation in public spirit, was substituted rivalry of dollars. Competition to win support by public service was destroyed wherever possible by power of suppression, by purchase."

Speed "Extras" to Cleveland by Plane

Three New York morning newspapers utilized airplanes this week to speed editions to Cleveland for National Republican Convention delegates. On Tuesday 3 planes of the Curtis Exhibition Company, carrying copies of the Times, Tribune, and World left New York just after dawn, arriving in Cleveland at 9:30 A. M. Circulation managers said copies were all sold by noon.

ONE of the most popular society page features we have ever tried is the inclusion under our daily "Society Calendar" of a recipe contributed by some local housewife of known culinary ability. The women readers pick up the paper every night and turn to the society page to learn who the recipe donor is—even before they turn to the comics. There is no truer measure of popularity than this. —W. Earl Hall Mason City (Ia.) Globe-Gazette.

How often do the motorists in your city buy new cars? Is the average one new car a year, or one new car every year and a half? Or what is it? Ask 100 motorists how often they buy new cars and get their reasons for buying when they do and incorporate the whole in a strikingly interesting story for your automobile page.—Frank H. Have you ever wondered as to what might be the reason men do not change their style of dress as often as women? Perhaps your readers have done some wondering, too. Local men's clothiers could probably shed some light on the subject, as could also a few prominent local men of your city. Puttting the question to women might add a little flavor to the story.—R. C. Bolton, Jr., 315 West 97th street, New York.

If you were given an ideal day off what would it be like? Let a staff man put this up to people of all sorts, not overlooking the woman at home. It made a dandy Sunday special for the Boston Globe.—James M. Mosely, 39 East Concord street, Boston, Mass.

PROF. WILLIAM LYON PHELPS of Yale, who conducts the department "As I Like It" in Scribner's Magazine, is a preacher's son who is also interested in journalism. His father was not only a Baptist clergyman at Hartford, Conn., but was also the editor of the Christian Secretary. The future professor at Yale became a regular contributor to that paper when only fourteen. Like Melville E. Stone of the Associated Press, he can boast of fifty years at journalism. Stone's father, in addition to being a Methodist clergyman, was the editor of the Christian Advocate published at Chicago.

OUR OWN WORLD OF LETTERS

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

FRANKLIN P. ADAMS, the columnist for the New York World, is going to call his new volume of verse "So Much Velvet." To the Bookman for June he contributed a love lyric entitled "The True-Love."

The newspaper classic in this field is doubtless the following:

May I print a kiss on your pretty lips?
And she nodded her full permission;
So we went to press, and I rather guess
We printed an extra edition.

LAURENCE STALLINGS, the new literary critic of the New York World, has gone to Europe for a few months. The Bookman for June, however, prints his "Notes on Contraband Prose." He and Maxwell Anderson, the editorial writer, have collaborated in a war play which Arthur Hopkins will produce this fall.

JOHN W. OWENS, who writes on political topics for the Baltimore Sun, has drawn a fine portrait of Senator George W. Norris of Nebraska, in the New Republic for June 11. Here is a snap-shot from the photographic pen of Owens:

But I never see Norris on the Senate floor burly body; massive head and face; direct, candid, fearless speech—that I do not see that peasant of eastern Europe who lifted himself to mastery. Norris is the plain man in a fine and rare mold.

JOHN. H. FINLEY, who since 1921 has been Associate Editor of the New York Times, is probably the best "legman" connected with New York newspapers. He made the twenty-six-mile stretch from Marathon to Athens last summer in five hours flat. As he covered this famous stretch he composed his poem "The Blue Flowers of Marathon," which is printed in Scribner's Magazine for June.

OHIO'S WEALTH

COMES FROM HER OWN SOIL

OHIO'S wealth comes largely from her own soil, a fact which alone would prejudice economists in its favor and which is of vital importance to national advertisers.

Agriculture, the leading industry, produces crops and live stock with an approximate value of $900,000,000, a figure exceeded by only four other states. Practically all her land is working and adding to the buying power of the state.

The soil of the state is universally fertile and this has given Ohio a leading position in every branch of agriculture.

The wealth of her soil, however, is not alone responsible for the prosperity of the state for her land is also rich in minerals. Beds of bituminous coal that is workable underlie 12,000 square miles of land, and the production is in excess of 45,000,000 tons annually. There are about 50,000 miners that receive more than $48,000,000 in wages yearly.

Ohio's population of 5,759,394 is fourth in the Union and is advantageously distributed between the cities and farming communities.

Almost 50,000 retail dealers serve the people with goods that are advertised in the newspapers. There are 1.2 such stores for every square mile of territory and there are 2,600 wholesale dealers in practically every commodity that is used by American people.

OHIO FIRST AS A MARKET

Ohio answers First as a market, making it an ideal tryout proposition for national advertising campaigns. Ohio newspapers cover the cities and towns and the country round about and ultimately find their way into every home.

The Sun's Consistent Growth

IN the year 1922 The Sun made a greater gain in advertising than the gains of all other New York evening newspapers combined.

In 1923 The Sun gained more than a million lines of advertising compared with the year 1922.

In the five months of this year The Sun has gained approximately one and a half million lines of advertising compared with the corresponding months in 1923—by far the largest gain in advertising for this period made by any newspaper, morning or evening, in America; and despite the fact that The Sun is published only six days a week, excluding Sunday, while most other newspapers with large gains are published seven.

The Sun's great, consistent and continuing growth is a reflection of great, consistent and continuing results to its advertisers; results assured by the dominant position of The Sun among the more intelligent and prosperous of all classes in New York City—the world's greatest market.

The more than 250,000 daily purchasers of The Sun constitute the largest circulation of high-class readers attained by any New York evening newspaper.

A TWO-COLOR ADVERTISEMENT BY AN AMERICAN FIRM IN LONDON. THIS IS A REPRODUCTION OF THE FIRST COLOR ANNOUNCEMENT IN THE "DAILY EXPRESS." IT BROUGHT MANY THOUSANDS OF REQUESTS FOR A SAMPLE TUBE OF KOLYNOS.

In Great Britain you get National Attention—National Distribution most quickly by using the Back Page of the

"DAILY EXPRESS" IN TWO COLORS

THE back page of the "Daily Express" has always been regarded as an important feature of a national advertising campaign in Great Britain.

This valuable space is now open for advertisements in two colors.

Cartons, packages, labels, trade marks, etc., can be shown in their actual predominating color, while a coupon or special offer set off in contrasting tints claims instant attention. Dealers can be more readily induced to display a reprint of an advertisement invested with attractiveness and life by color.

A recent survey showed that 65% of retailers in London and its suburbs—the greatest market in the world—read the "Daily Express" regularly.

To introduce an article to the British Market and to consolidate distribution, the "Daily Express" is the most economical and effective medium.

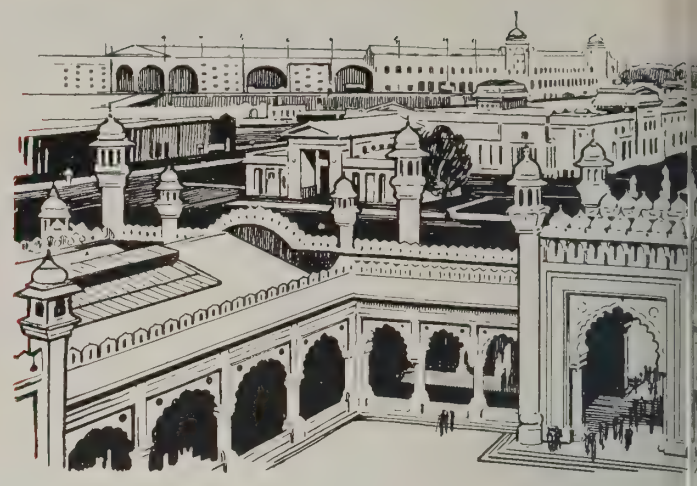
SELL TO BRITONS IN A BRITISH WAY

Britain lies near to America to-day. Voices will carry from Schenectady and Pittsburgh to London, to Manchester, to the provinces.

The British market is of all the divisions of the American export market, the most accessible to American goods, and the most cordial.

But the voice of advertising 'made in America' cannot reach to the heart of the British buying public, even where it reaches their ears.

The British consumer has buying habits, merchandising practices and taboos undreamed of in America. Disregard of them may undo the work of a brilliant campaign.



If a commodity is to be sold successfully in Britain, the selling must be done with an understanding of the British people that is not come by in weeks or even years.

W. S. Crawford's is an advertising agency that has this inbred understanding, that has also a service second to none, and a peculiar sympathy with American methods. Among its clients are the following American advertisers:

YALE AND TOWNE MFG. CO.
J. B. WILLIAMS CO.
STATLER HOTELS
MECCANO LTD.
MARK CROSS
LEA AND PERRIN'S SAUCE
CORONA TYPEWRITER CO.

The Judgment of —MITCHELLS

Advertisers, whose names are household words, in all parts of the world, have placed their publicity arrangements in our hands and have been guided by the Mitchell judgment.

We use the word "judgment" deliberately, because in these days successful advertising is not entirely a matter of clever words, interest-compelling pictures, or large and expensive spaces in widely circulating journals. It is much more important that the advertiser should bring to his aid long trained, experienced and thoroughly skilled judgment. If the judgment at the base of the recommendations is at fault, then the whole of the subsequent schemes, no matter how ably handled, must fail.

We offer to advertisers in the Home British market, and in the markets of the British Dominions Overseas, and also on the Continent of Europe, the expert service and guidance of men who have had experience of many successful national and international publicity campaigns.

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pens

"We congratulate you on the completion of 25 years in business. We would like, if we could, to convey to you in words just what we feel, and to express to you our admiration for the high-minded way you have conducted your business. It has been a great pleasure to us to have you as our Advertising Agent, and it has helped us in our business more than we can say. If our business had been your own you could not have shown greater devotion and attention to our interests. The designs produced by your Art Department and the writing-up of the various advertisements can only have been done in such a splendid way because of a real interest in that service, far beyond the mere profit obtained through the business we place with you. So long as we have you to take charge of our Press advertising we can safely entrust to you that part of our business without any anxiety whatever, and to say this in the present condition of the world's business is to say a great deal."

Profit from others' experience is Net Profit to YOU

TURN YOUR EYES TO BRITAIN

One Hundred Eloquent Britons—Ambassadors of Advertising—Cast a Magic Spell Over a Great Business Convention to Such Effect That Two Thousand Americans Make Pilgrimage Overseas to Seek Closer Communion—An Epoch in Anglo-American History.

THE eyes of business men throughout the world are turned to Great Britain—on what is expected to be the greatest convention the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World have given us.

For these bold Britons took it upon themselves to demand a place in what we Americans have deemed to be merely our sun. Today, we may, in all good nature and without harm, comment upon their colossal nerve. A year ago, they put one over on us.

For twenty years the work of the advertising clubs in the United States has resulted in a close-knit organization that has given us in yearly succession a series of advertising conventions of immeasurable value. Among the thousands of clubs that in their affiliation were known as the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, there entered a modest little affair quartered in Great Britain, the Thirty Club of London—thirty by name and in number. A little later came another little British club, the Advertising Club of Ulster, and these two were the only links that existed between the American organization and Europe to justify the title "Associated Advertising Clubs of the World."

Those two baby clubs said little and apparently just stood for two unassuming members of the parent body. Occasionally, Sir Charles Higham appeared at an American convention, but the great country in the little islands was too busily occupied repairing the ravages of war to be able to afford time for more than sleeping partenership.

It was in 1920 that the Thirty Club of London held a remarkable Advertising Exhibition at the White City, and out of this came the inspiration to a London Scotsman, W. S. Crawford, that the next step of the Thirty Club should be to obtain for Great Britain one of those advertising conventions that America held each year as a matter of course. No sooner thought than proposed—a year later Milwaukee saw a definite invitation extended by the Thirty Club of London that an A. A. C. W. convention should be held in Great Britain. The response was, perhaps, typically American—"Show us that you want us and we will come."

Then in 1923 a silver-tongued band of a Hundred bold Britons came here. They brought nothing but the sunshine of themselves. They were headed by a gentleman of simple English style. They came, as it seemed to some, almost timidly, but that was only their English—and Scottish and Irish—reserve. At Atlantic City they were the least conspicuous of all the delegates.

They pressed their claim upon the convention, quietly, eloquently. The rest of the story is known. By common assent, with the sportsmanlike delegates from Houston gracefully withdrawing their candidacy, the award of the convention was for "LONDON, 1924." They deserved it.

And now, twelve months later, we stand, our eyes turned toward Great Britain.

In the intervening time we have seen a wonderful effect in the making Week by week, month by month a tide has been flowing—a tide of goodwill towards Britain. Not in the entire history of the advertising club movement has there been witnessed such a thing. "On-to-Britain" was the watchword. Never has there been such a flow of desire—such a determination to visit a convention centre.

ON TO LONDON SONG

Words by Helen Waldo, vice-president of the League of Advertising Women of New York, and written by her to celebrate the World Advertising Convention to be held at Wembley this summer.

Tune—"Battle Hymn of the Republic".

I

It happened that some Englishmen, three hundred years ago
Came over in a little boat whose name you're sure to know,
And thus began the U. S. A. which we are going to show
The world in twenty-four.

Refrain

Come with us and go to London,
Charming, fascinating London,
Quaint and queer, old-fashioned London
In nineteen twenty-four.

II

So we are going over there to show them what we've done
To carry out the dreams they had so long ago begun;
From out the rugged wilderness a nation has been won
Upon this Western shore.

Refrain

Pack your bag and start for London,
Fabled, old, historic London,
Johnson's, Dickens', Shakespeare's London
In nineteen twenty-four.

III

Oh, we believe in advertising what we have to sell,
But honesty's the policy in which we would excel,
The motto, "Truth in Advertising" will the chorus swell
Into a mighty roar.

Refrain

When we all arrive in London,
Courteous, kindly, friendly London,
Open-hearted, waiting London
In nineteen twenty-four.

It is not the convention as such that is the main attraction. It is n Britain as such that makes the call. It is just the answer—the re-action—that eloquent little band of one hundred British pilgrims.

What was it John Cheshire said?

"We are the modern Pilgrim Fathers come to ask their sons to com home."

That is the spirit which EDITOR & PUBLISHER believes lies behind th action of every American delegate in planning to sail for the Wemble Convention.

It is one that Americans shou capitalize.

Let us not forget, however, th we go to a convention where adve tising is the topic, the be-all and t end-all.

These Britons tell us we are pa masters in advertising. Maybe; b the British themselves have for ge erations been styled a "nation shopkeepers"—a sneer of Napole has become a truism. The Briti were shopkeepers before our ow nation was cradled.

There is Youth in British adve tising today and Youth will be serve

The Youth in British advertisi is typified in the President of t London Convention, Harold Verno

The Youth of American advert ing will greet the Pilgrim Fathers a the Youths of England.

We may teach them somethin but equally so we may learn mo from them.

Our advertising men and wom are going to know their Briti cousins better than they have ev known them.

But knowing them is somethi more than shaking hands. Don't e pect our British hosts to dash at yo on Waterloo Station with the greetin "Gee, boys, this is just bully," wa ing Union Jacks and Strip

They will extend their hand beam, grip, and say "Well, I'm gla to meet you. I hope we'll make yo feel at home."

And behind that simple rema will be a world of British sincerity. They'll mean it.

The English people do not understand the American institution calle "convention." An Englishman who recently called at EDITOR & PUBLISHER office, after a tour of our country, was "amazed by the conventions in ever city visited, the hotel corridors swarming with delegates wearing ribbone badges." The Englishman at home attends dinner parties, staff meetings, co ferences and the like, but the American "convention" is a novelty there, certa to interest the great city of London and bring into the lives of the advertisin delegates novel and memorable experiences.

The flags and banners and chorus-singing will follow. The British hosts do not "make themselves at home" until they see they have made the guests comfortable. But in 24 hours you will love them like the folk of yo own hometown.

You will find them honest and affectionate—Old-World, like their citie

Give them greeting. You will learn many new things of them, of the country, of their aspirations, of their influence and their sterling qualities.

We could wish our American delegation were twenty times 2,000 for th outcome of the understanding that will come to them. For in the years ahea even when this historic convention in London is but a memory, every one of yo among those two thousand at the mention of "friends" will—

SPECIAL COMMITTEES

It is suggested that Special Committees be appointed at the Convention to consider in conference two new topics as follows:

ADVERTISING MAN'S CREED—A proposal has been made for the adoption of a simple creed for the individual advertising man, to be put in the nature of a resolution. This simple creed would materialize the two major elements in the entire program of the A.A.C. of W. and particularly this program in London, i.e., the definite obligation to pursue the subject of Truth and the definite obligation to follow the spirit of establishing an international code of honor for the advertising man. A Committee will be formed to deal with the matter in London, and a prominent British advertising man will present the resolution at the Convention.

ADVERTISING CLUB ACTIVITIES—It would seem desirable that this important Convention should not pass without a special meeting of

BRITAIN BUILDS BIG HOPES ON CONVENTION

Chairman Vernon, Head of London Convention, Declares It Sure Proof that Advertising is Too Great to Be Localized or Nationalized—It Belongs to Whole World—Good Business and Friendship.

By C. HAROLD VERNON

WE are now within a few weeks of the International Advertising Convention for 1924—the culminating point of the On-to-London Movement—the goal that so many of us have been working for, planning for, looking forward to for so many months.

What will all this enthusiasm, this unceasing effort, this great determination result in? Of one thing we may be certain, it will lead to more than a world-wide convention; more than an important assembly; more than a mere interchange of ideas. The convention that caused over 100 Britons to visit America with an invitation to come to London, and that is shortly bringing 2,000 American enthusiasts to Great Britain will have far-reaching results.

The mere fact that it is to be held in London is charged with significance: it is a sure proof, if proof were needed, that advertising is too great to be localized, too great to be nationalized—it belongs to the whole wide world.

We in Great Britain have great hopes for this meeting of advertising enthusiasts from the five continents. We believe that it will prove to be the most successful, the most inspiring convention, that has yet been held.

For the first time the interchange of ideas will be quickened by the presence of more European advertising men than have ever been able to attend before, while, thanks to the remarkable enthusiasm of the American delegates, the United States will still be represented in full. International in the fullest sense, this assembly will include the finest brains in the profession from all over the world.

These earnest and capable delegates will have three main objects in view and, because they are enthusiasts, they will have some considerable measure of success.

The convention program aims at:—

The furtherance of the cause of Truth in Advertising, thereby increasing public confidence, without which all advertising is wasted, and the raising of the status of the profession.

The promotion of friendly relations between the leaders of industry in every country, believing that good business need not eliminate good feeling.

C. HAROLD VERNON

Chairman, Organizing Committee, London Convention
Chairman of District 14, A. A. C. W. President of The Thirty Club of London

The general advance of the art and craft of "telling" by advertising which will mean more "selling," thereby stimulating trade and increasing employment, will hasten the world's return to peace and prosperity.

Big aims, certainly, but aims that will lead to the big achievement, to the real and lasting improvement of advertising, to a genuine step towards the dawn of better days.

One of the most important results of the convention will be fillip given to the advertising club movement. Many of those present will demonstrate the great benefit that the advertising club can bring—not merely to its members and their profession—but to the world at large. It affords opprotunities for local advertising men to exchange ideas, to increase their efficiency, to eliminate untruthful or undesirable elements, and to build up public confidence in advertising as a reliable and valuable public service.

We cannot have too many advertising clubs; however small they are, however humble their beginnings, they mark the activities of men and women whose hearts are in their profession, and they are the greatest source of inspiration and good-fellowship, the surest means of advancing this fascinating profession which serves the entire population of the world.

More advertising clubs mean more advertising, more efficient advertising, more truthful, trustworthy advertising, and so—more trade, more employment and better conditions all round.

And what the advertising club does locally, the advertising convention does internationally. This, be assured, is no mean contribution to the progress of the world.

This is what we looked for and we feel this is what we may expect. The stage is being set and when the curtain falls after the closing session on July 17 our effort will be finished, but we are confident that our desire will be achieved, and we feel ourselves fortunate in that our plans and arrangements have been approved by Mr. Holland, the president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, the master whom we have served, and, while we welcome him as leader of this great and world-wide organization of men and women engaged in the business of advertising, we extend the same welcome to every delegate who will cross the seas to attend the 20th Convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in London.

WHAT THIS EDITION STANDS FOR

EDITOR & PUBLISHER feels that this edition—differing in its contents as it does so widely from its accustomed form—is worth an explanatory note.

When the project of a Special Number of pre-convention interest was mooted, it was felt that the historic circumstances in which the 1924 Convention of the A. A. C. of W. was to be held, demanded an exceptional treatment worthy of the event.

Here was the first Convention to be held overseas—in Great Britain. How it came about and the story of the gallant little band of British delegates that stormed the fortress of Atlantic City in 1923, has been written in imperishable letters in the famous "On-to-London" number issued last June.

Here was a new style of Advertising Convention—with the business men of another country than our own as hosts.

That country and its people were known to us in something little more than visionary form—they were three thousand miles and six days away.

They were an older people than ourselves. Their customs and ways were not as ours. We, in our imaginings, have conceived them, maybe, as being less advanced than ourselves. We admired them without knowing them.

They were friends, yet strangers.

But something like two thousand American Business men and women have contracted to visit that country in July as delegates to the Advertising Convention to be held at the British Empire Exhibition.

These were the reflections that rendered acute the question of just what form should be taken by this Special On-to-Britain Number of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

It could not be in the nature of a rally. That work had been done. The ships would be well-nigh at sailing point.

But there was a work this number could do and in the mind of our London Editor, Herbert C. Ridout, its mission was conceived as that of endeavoring to prepare the minds of the U. S. delegates for the people, and the conditions of the great country in which the 1924 Convention is to be held next month.

That, in short, is the raison d'etre of this On-to-Britain number. Once the ideal fixed, the London editor set about securing the co-operation of the leading British authorities to aid him in providing a survey of the British newspaper and advertising field.

How well that has been done, these pages themselves testify. The hearty co-operation extended by leading newspaper and advertising men of Great Britain with the object of presenting a series of pictures of British conditions, British advertising practice and British ideals, is in itself first a tribute to the high and general recognition in that country of the significance of the Convention, second, a compliment to the American delegates themselves, and finally, a revelation of the spirit of brotherhood that proffers its experience and its knowledge in free exchange for what our delegates themselves have to offer.

Dealt with in these pages are many topics that are not likely to be discussed at the Convention, either in general or departmental sessions. That was the plan—to broaden, to supplement the interchange of ideas at the Convention by providing accurate on-the-spot details of what Britain has done and is doing in the practice of advertising.

We, of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, have the assurance of those competent to judge that never in the history of American or British trade journalism has one single edition of any publication ever given either such a wealth of practical information concerning the British field or so many exclusive features signed by recognized authorities as are presented in these pages.

To the delegates sailing for London we say:—Know the country you are going to see, the people and their world, and the Convention you attend there will have a greater, fuller meaning for you.

To those who are tied to their posts at home we say:—Learn something of this Great Britain that gained this 1924 Convention, learn a little of its conditions and its people from these stories.

Our acknowledgments are due to the many distinguished British contributors to this edition, who by their generous co-operation have aided EDITOR & PUBLISHER to another achievement in the cause of Anglo-American goodwill.

A DREAM COME TRUE

By W. S. CRAWFORD

ONE of the world's masterpieces, the "Pilgrim's Progress" begins "And it came to pass he dreamed a dream." I cannot do better than imitate the simplicity of John Bunyan.

Years ago I dreamt a dream. After seeing advertising conventions in the States, I dreamt of a great convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the

W. S. CRAWFORD

World in London. From a dream that in its infancy seemed but a wild fancy, I dreamt of what might be, if but the dream could be transformed into reality. I saw a mighty panorama, in which stood shoulder to shoulder a solid phalanx of men and women. Above them were flowing banners bearing the signs of all nations. And before them on a sweeping banner that dominated all was the word "ADVERTISING."

The dream was that of a victorious host, welded into one brotherhood by the magic of advertising, a host that had won a world victory over smallness, racial differences, individual ambitions, and brought together in common fellowship.

The cause was advertising, the men and women instruments in its practice. Their association with the purifying influence had resulted in an international goodwill.

I dreamt of two great countries—our own and yours. I saw in this great advertising convention in Britain something that no event of the kind had yet achieved. I saw Expansion—expansion of our interests, mutual and international.

Enough! The dream was a spur to action. I talked of my dream to my advertising friends and we set to work to realize it. There were numberless disappointments and difficulties. Sometimes it seemed as if the dream would never come true, but the enthusiastic and devoted work of British advertising and newspaper men has secured a triumphant success. Had the dream come true earlier the success would have been less splendid. When, this July, the International Advertising Convention meets at the wonderful British Empire Exhibition at Wembley, London, we shall see the splendid realization of a dream.

By a happy stroke of fortune this great Advertising Convention is housed amid the greatest advertisement that the British Empire ever had. I am proud that Americans should see the glory of our great commonwealth of nations, which expresses so finely the constructive and governing powers of the British people.

There are the stately buildings of Australia and Canada, the future sources of food supply for the world; the superb Indian building with its story of Britain's success in long-distance government; the great South African exhibit showing the unifying power of free institutions under the British flag, and the fact that Britain controls the world's supply of gold and diamonds. There, romantic Malaya gives vivid pictures of how a savage country has been turned by British enterprise into the chief rubber and tin supplies of the world; picturesque Burmah shows how Britons have developed its wealth of rice, oil and timber. From regions as far apart as British Guiana, Fiji and Newfoundland come evidences of the stirring vitality of the British race.

We are indeed proud to be able in such splendid surroundings to extend the hand of welcome to the advertisers of the world. When to the lessons we learn in craftsmanship at this great exhibition we add a wider knowledge of selling and advertising, we shall see a great stimulus to international trade, for prosperity and peace throughout the world.

I still see visions and dream dreams.

I look forward to future advertising conventions the world over, pooling the brains and experience of mankind for our common benefit. I see our profession raised to a lofty pinnacle, its forces united, its men honored.

I see the highest standard of truth set in advertising to the enormous benefit of honest traders, and scientific methods of research applied to trade problems which will make marketing far more sure, successful and economical. I see careful studies of the psychology of different communities and peoples eliminating the trade difficulties that rise through local and national misunderstanding.

Great as is the power of advertising today, it is but in its youth. I see it as it grows in power, not only increasing the friendship of all English-speaking races, but making for the general brotherhood of mankind. I see it aiding in spreading the world use of all beneficial inventions, helping the poor by cheapening products, and removing the tragedy of unemployment by giving the opportunity of honest work at fair wages to all. I see it checking disease, broadcasting enlightenment, and working for the peace of the world.

Dreams they may be—but the dreams of today are the realities of tomorrow.

Who knows what will grow from the dream that finds realization in "London 1924"?

"TEXAS NEXT—1925"

Witness in the columns of this issue the urgent call of Houston, Texas!

Houston means business—wants the 1925 convention of the A. A. C. W. as the fat and pink baby in the tub wants the well-known cake of soap and will not be happy without it.

In these columns the most representative men of Texas and Houston plead the cause.

"On to Texas—1925," is the new slogan.

SOME THINGS THIS CONVENTION OUGHT TO PUT RIGHT

By Sir CHARLES F. HIGHAM

THERE are so many things that the convention could put right, that I hesitate almost to dictate an article on this subject, but I will touch upon, if I may, a few of the points that I think would be of value to the advertising fraternity.

First and foremost, I think there should be a clearly defined working arrangement between the agents in the

SIR CHARLES F. HIGHAM

United States and the agents in other countries. I am one of those who believe that the advertising agents would be willing to come to an arrangement to do business in their own country, and not outside their own country, except through agents in that particular country.

When I inaugurated the India Tea Campaign in the United States, I could very easily have placed the advertising from London, and have done it much more profitably through myself, but I do not think I could have done it more profitably for my clients. Therefore I placed the advertising with an American advertising agency, just as I feel that American advertising agents having business to place in this country ought to place it through an English agency, and I feel that I am permitted to make this statement largely because of the fact that I had 15 years' experience in the United States, and I know the people of that country so well, but there are so many things I do not know, and which only agents on the spot could know, that I feel it is better for an English advertiser doing business in America, to place the advertising through a representative agent in that country, and vice versa.

Another thing this convention should put right, is to arrive at some method of training young men and women for this business. I feel that there is a dearth of brains in the advertising business, and it is essential, if this industry is to grow, that we arrange for some method of training people who have the "flair" for advertising.

Nothing has been done internationally, on this subject, but I see no reason why it should not come before the convention, to be discussed.

The training could be in the form of scholarships offered by advertisers, newspapers, or agents, or some other way.

Another thing the convention ought to try to put right, is to further the vigilance work of the Associated Clubs. The advertisers and advertising agents ought to be strong enough today to get an undertaking from the newspapers that they will not take fraudulent advertising of any kind. It would be a tremendous step forward, if we could eliminate the "fake" companies, the fraudulent share offers, the unnecessary "puff," and generally put the whole business of advertising on a higher standard. In fact, the magnificent work done by the vigilance committee in the United States should be made international.

Of course, probably the biggest problem that we could tackle would be the elimination of jealousy and envy in our profession. I know that it is very altruistic, and some people would say, farfetched, but the idea of each of us decrying the merits of others is to the detriment of every man and woman in the advertising business.

We ought to co-operate more. We ought to understand the other fellow's point of view more easily. We ought to be more charitable. We are in, probably, the greatest calling in the world, and a great part of the time we are calling down each other. It is a great mistake. I think the convention in itself will do a lot to eliminate this, because the meeting together of men and women from all countries will have a tendency to make us understand each other better, and this will be a great help.

Of course, there is bound to be in every profession and in every calling, the "little minded man," who can only see round his own horizon; who cannot appreciate the men or women who have gone forward, and thank God they have. This, I think, is the most serious difficulty which we have in the furtherance of our calling—the constant finding fault with each other.

If a man succeeds, somebody says "How did he do it." If an agent gets a new account, the other fellow says, "Why in the name of God, did they give it to him." If the billboard man gets an order, the advertising man says "Why waste money on the billboards" and vice versa.

What we want to do is to make the world believe in advertising, and we cannot make them believe in advertising, unless we believe in ourselves.

We have got to have a greater faith, and greater charity, and this convention will help to bring it about, if the spirit is there, but if the spirit is not there, then no great reform will ever take place, in our calling, or anyone else's.

I love the advertising business. I wish every other man and woman in it had my point of view—to believe in it not only as a business, but for themselves. Do not be afraid of publicity, either for yourselves or other people. It is frankly stupid to hide your light under a bushel if you are engaged in the advertising business. I have had some of the most clever men in the business say to me "Charlie Higham, the trouble with you is that you like the limelight too much," and I have said. "Why hide from the light? It is our business. What is the good of telling other people to advertise their goods, etc, if we have not got faith in the method we tell others to use."

We have got to stand shoulder to shoulder with each other. Help, not hinder. We are all human. Do not let any of us forget that, but the man who is stronger, who can criticise, is the man to stand by us, and show us the way.

Nagging each other only drags down our profession. We all cannot stand in the centre of the stage. It is well to remember this, but when, by experience, courage, hard knocks, we have got to the centre of the stage, do not let the "supers" say they can play it better, but let them learn to play it better, and someday they will have the star place too!

I think that this convention will do much to place advertising in the right light, but if it does, it will only be because the men and women who are taking part in it, see the right light themselves, and will express it to the full.

THE 100 MILLION DOLLAR SHOW AT WEMBLEY

Where the A. A. C. W. 1924 Convention Will Be Held in Britain—Fifteen Minutes' Run from the Heart of London Has Been Built a New City—Materialization of the Wonders and Achievements of the British Empire

By ROSS GURNEY

FOR about two years the British Empire even in its most distant and undeveloped corners, has thought, worked, and lived "Wembley."

It was Lord Strathcona who had the idea some years ago. And it is now possible to connect his thought form with the $100,000,000 exhibition which has grown into being in Wembley, near London.

In this wonderful city of 240 acres, with the world's largest ferro-concrete buildings, and a stadium accommodating 110,000 people, the A. A. C. W. will hold its 1924 convention—a proud gathering in the proudest of surroundings yet accorded in its history.

We are told that this British Empire Exhibition amounts to something approximating the eighth wonder of the world. America has had some mammoth expositions of its own, but this is said to transcend them all.

In its organization the promoters found themselves with quite a little bunch of problems to solve.

Among them were two that face the organizers of any exhibition on the grand scale. The first is to collect the exhibits on such terms and conditions as will assure success. The second is so to display the exhibits as to command the respect of the minority that possesses taste, and to awaken in the majority those emotions from which taste is born.

Down to a few years ago organizers recognized only the first problem, with the result that chaos and incongruity exercised what might be called mob law, and those who had no personal interest in the exhibits kept away from them.

Perhaps the first exhibition that admitted good taste to its councils was held in Munich a couple of years ago. It was followed by the Gothenburg Exhibition in Sweden last year. These were very striking displays. They struck an entirely new note; unfortunately they struck it rather too hard. Their promoters had not taken to heart the warning of Koholeth and had sought to be righteous overmuch. They did not destroy themselves, but they did rather over-shadow their exhibitors. It was as though they had taken for their motto "Beauty, not business.'

Now the British nation is said to be rather suspicious of beauty and on no more than a nodding acquaintance with taste; the Empire's children overseas take after the home folk. Had the individual his way, he would undoubtedly have endeavored to make each exhibit fight its neighbor, shout it down, so to speak. Happily Munich and Gothenburg did not exhibit in vain. They were there to point a moral. It was impossible to exercise the arts of compromise, and as a famous British politician once remarked, compromise is one of the first factors of statecraft.

The net result of endless work and arguments conducive to high blood pressure was a uniform scheme, under which, in certain leading sections of the Exhibition, the individual is sunk in the display. The display shows the ripe fruits of years of endeavor and experiment, and industry is lifted to noble heights.

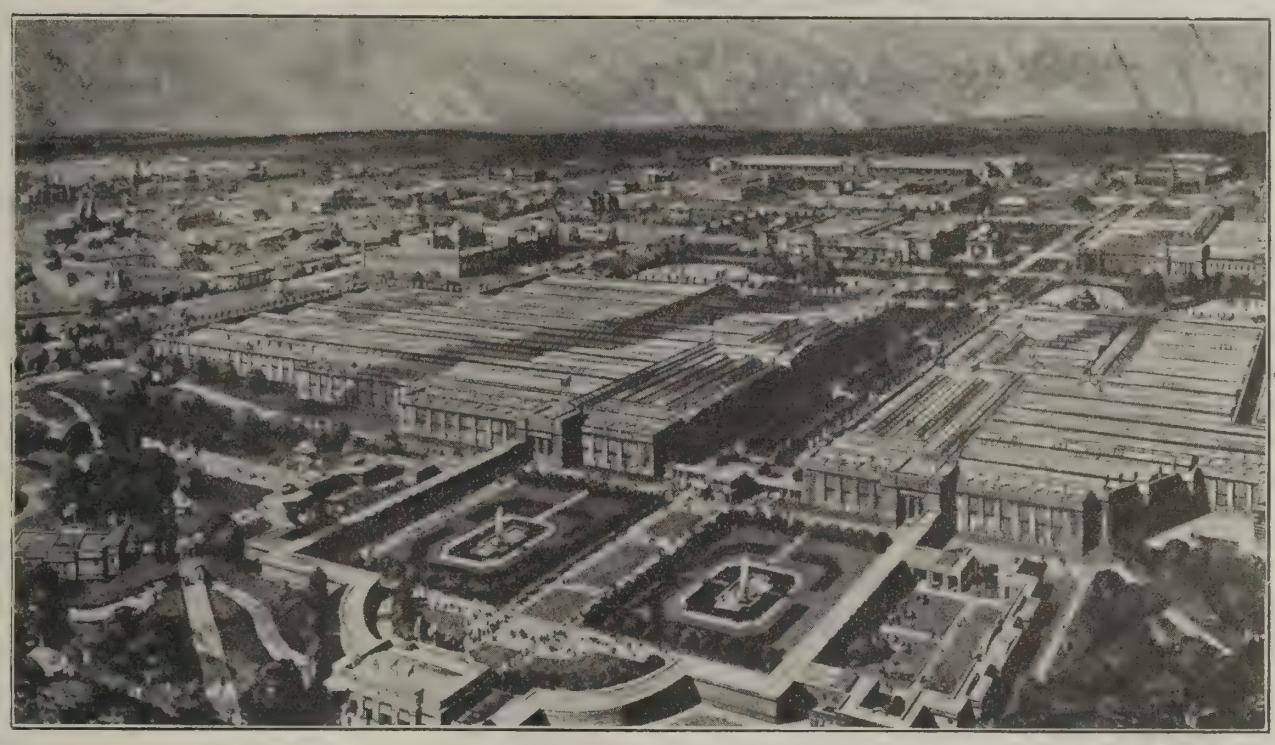
Let the most casual visitor, sensitive enough to have suffered from the chaos of the past, start at Wembley by walking through the Palace of Industry at his leisure. He will come out as tranquil as he went in, and impressed as he never was before, because he will understand what is possible when men work in union under capable advice. To be sure, he may feel a little angry with the folk who gave the title of exhibition to some of the collections of past times, but he is bound to realize that these errors are on their death-bed and that Wembley will see to it that there is no recovery for them.

The fact that dominates the British Empire Exhibition is that, despite its vastness, the lay-out is on large, comprehensive and harmonious lines. Color blindness will be a misfortune and no longer an infliction to be grateful for. There isn't a headache in any section.

A day will not exhaust the wonders of even a single exhibit—say Australia alone, for this covers five and a half acres and includes a pavilion as large as the Pennsylvania Terminal in New York and a movie theatre wherein 500 people at a time can see for themselves what life at the Antipodes is like. All round the walls a gay frieze tell the story of the natural wealth that has brought prosperity to settlers, one may see orchards and vineyards, dairies and great pastures where sheep in their tens of thousands prepare in comfort to supply countless tons of wool and, in the fulness of time, with mutton.

Canada's display of national wealth and achievement is of course concerned very largely with agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, but due attention is paid to the mineral wealth that has rewarded some and will reward many more in the near future. The railways which may be said to have done the pioneer work will be strongly represented, and a determined effort will be made to stir the imagination of those who have youth, strength and the spirit of adventure.

India's story demands an acreage wellnigh as great as that of Australia or Canada for its expression. Within its vast pavilion the Indian Princes are exhibiting the bewildering resources of their States in a series of Courts. All those arts and crafts in which the various races excel are shown on a scale never attempted before.



New Zealand, held by so many to be the happiest of all the Dominions overseas, stages an agricultural and marine exhibit, and calls in the aid of the movies to present the daily movements that lead to prosperity and content.

South Africa has her Union pavilion built in old Dutch fashion, and the gardens that front it show so much as is possible of the South African flora. All the exports are staged, diamonds and gold, fruit and wines, mohair and wool, together with ostrich feathers on live ostriches, and one of the two picture displays reveals the travel side of life in the wildest parts of the country.

The West Indian and Atlantic groups tell of the joys of travel and their gardens, weather permitting, will enable the visitor to glimpse the tropics, though should the English summer live down to the low level of Jean Paul Richter's jibe and appear in the guise of English winter painted green, it is more than likely that tropical roots will refuse to strike.

Burma, with its memories of Mandalay, its exquisite temples from which the little bells peal at the bidding of every breeze, is undoubtedly one of the beauty spots of Wembley. Ceylon, Hong Kong, Palestine, Cyprus, Malaya with its model of the much debated harbor of Singapore—it is possible to mention half a dozen of these "sections" in a sentence; it is not possible to discover all their secrets in a week. They must be seen in their splendor.

Since some reference has been made to the weather, it is fair to add that in the worst that summer can send us the visitor can travel from one Dominion to another throughout the length and breadth of the Exhibition without affording Jupiter Pluvius so much as a chance to enforce the use of an umbrella.

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE EXPOSITION

Towers and domes, minarets and palace walls, bridges and formal gardens, glimpses of China and Africa and India at their loveliest and most fantastic. It is the British Empire in miniature, made to scale, and with a view to a harmonious whole, and so faithfully has everything been reproduced and solidly carried out that it will remain, in part, a permanent exhibition.

PLANS OF THE GREAT CANADIAN EXHIBIT BUILDINGS

The Canadian and Australian pavilions face the Palaces of Engineering and Industries, across the lake which divides the exhibition, with the pavilion of the Indian Empire at one end.

THE SOLIDLY-BUILT PALACE OF ENGINEERING, NEARING COMPLETION

The Palace of Engineering, which is probably the largest concrete building in the world, will represent more than three hundred engineering and shipbuilding firms, and will contain all manner of engineering exhibits, from the most delicate testing instrument to 150-ton pieces of machinery.

Modesty or courtesy has brought the British section last into notice, but in many respects it challenges all comers. Eighteen hundred exhibitors who have spent half a million pounds on the purchase of space and unnumbered thousands in turning it to best advantage under wise supervision, are represented here. The Palace of Engineering reveals all the latest developments by which manufacturers deal with raw material and conquer the problems of transport and lighting. It has a power station built by forty firms and a new system of using electricity that will create the biggest sensation since the first electrical exhibition was held in Great Britain some forty years ago. Sea transport, land and motor transport in their very latest aspects will be seen in this section where the greatest British firms in the engineering world are represented.

The Palace of Industry takes those industries of the United Kingdom which would be out of place in the engineering section, and here a wonderful unity in diversity has been reached. Chemistry, cotton textiles, woolen textiles, Ulster industries, all, or most of the food production specialties, musical instrument makers, soap, cigaret manufacturers and others too numerous to mention, find harmonious homes here.

Leading from the Palace of Industry are conference halls and committee rooms, ranging in accommodation from 100 to 3,000, and here will be the home of the A. A. C. W. convention in general and departmental sessions from July 14 to July 19.

A VIEW OF THE AUSTRALIAN EXHIBIT PLANS

So immense are the plans for separate parts of the exhibit that Canada and Australia have each spent $1,250,000 as their share in building alone.

Perhaps nothing in the Exhibition is more significant or impressive than the British Government pavilion. Above its lofty columned portico is the Royal Suite designed for the use of the King and Queen, and before those supporting columns are six lions that typify strength and dignity in repose,

In the Central Court of Honor a luminous relief map of the world tells in color a story of British Empire resources, growth, development and population in fashion calculated to attract the eye and hold the mind.

On a stage within this pavilion the Army, Navy and Air Force have organized displays that will bring home to the uninitiated the pomp and circumstance of the material powers that defend the British Isles and recall in striking detail episodes that marked grave crises in British history. This stage can be one of land or water at the will of the mechanicians who control it.

It is best to consider first the educational purpose of the Royal Pavilion and to pass by way of the spectacular side to the varied attractions that the imposing stadium and the amusements park will provide. These attractions are too numerous for recital, for the British Empire Exhibition appeals to those who seek knowledge and those who desire recreation and in the catholicity of the endeavor lies the strength of the call to the old and the young, the grave and the gay, the learned and the simple.

OLD LONDON'S CHARMS AND THRILLS

A Little Guide for Convention Delegates to the Chief Attractions of the City of Everlasting Interest —With Some Notes on American Memorials

By "A LOVER OF LONDON"

IN THE early part of last year, when the suggestion was put forward that the 1924 Convention of the A. A. C. W. should be held in London, Editor and Publisher printed an article dealing in a general way with the British capital. It is now possible to supplement this with something treating specifically of the individual attractions of London and opportunity has been taken to incorporate notes on features in the way of American memorials. To comprehend what a foreign city holds for the visitor, it is essential first of all to acquire a proper interpretation of the historical buildings and other features. The real significance of the places visited can then be visualized in a proper perspective.

London has so much to show and the calls of the Convention and attractions of the wonderful British Empire Exhibition must of necessity occupy so much of the visitor's time that the period available for general sightseeing will be comparatively brief. Sightseeing itineraries will, of course, be a feature of the arrangements made for the reception of the delegates and their friends. Even so, the following notices will be found both useful and instructive to the American visitor generally and of very material advantage to those among them who would prefer to embark on their own sightseeing tours and to return to America confident in the knowledge that they have seen the things that really count among the sights of London. So far as getting about in the British capital is concerned there need be nothing to worrry about, maps and guides being freely distributed by the various traffic agencies, which, particularly the underground companies, are ever ready to assist visitors bent on sightseeing itineraries.

The Tower of London

Stands on the riverside and is both the best-preserved example of a mediæval fortress in Britain and the most historic castle in Europe. Consists of the great keep—the White Tower—built by William the Conqueror, encompassed by a double line of fortified walls erected by his successors. Was an arsenal, naval station, palace, court of justice, mint, and State prison, and is still used in the last-named connection. The White Tower contains the national collection of arms and armor. Dungeons in which celebrated prisoners were confined are shown. The Chapel of St. Peter and Vincula is the place of burial of those who were executed on the adjacent Tower Green. Wakefield Tower contains the Crown jewels. The Tower Warders wear Tudor costume. Tower Wharf, on which abuts Traitors' Gate, gives fine views of the Thames and its shipping.

St. Paul's Cathedral.

The first church founded in London. Has always been closely associated with civic and national history. Present building, by Sir Christopher Wren, the finest church erected in England since the Reformation. Of noble proportions externally and internally. Contains many memorials and the Crypt is the burial-place of Nelson, Wellington, and other illustrious sailors and soldiers; besides painters (including Sir Benjamin West, the American President of the Royal Academy), musicians, etc. Public may ascend to the dome, which commands fine views over London.

Westminster Abbey.

Was a monastery attached to the royal palace of Westminster, and has been the crowning-place of the English sovereigns from King Harold (1065) onwards and their burial-place from Henry III (died 1272) to George II (died 1760). Has become the valhalla of the English race and is the sepulchre of illustrious statesmen, sailors, men of letters, scientists, etc. Contains several American memorians—Longfellow, Lowell, etc.; and one set up by the State of Massachusetts Bay to the third Viscount Howe. Present buildings date largely from period of Henry III, who began the reconstruction of the manastery rebuilt by Edward the Confessor (d. 1065). Adjoining is St. Margaret's Church, the Parish Church of the monastery rebuilt by Edward the Dominions Overseas. This is the burial-place of Raleigh and it has other American associations. Present church dates from 15th Century.

The Palace of Westminster.

Until the time of Henry VIII this was the principal seat of the English sovereigns, hence it was the cradle of national government and legislation. The original palace was built by Edward the Confessor and many additions and reconstructions were made by later kings, the most notable being the great hall (Westminster Hall) erected by William Rufus in 1097. Save this hall (remodelled in 1398 by Richard II, who added the superb open roof of timber) and a few minor details, the old palace was destroyed by fire in 1834. The New Palace of Westminster—invariably termed the Houses of Parliament—is the most original and most magnificent building erected in England in modern times, the decorative work of the interior being of singular richness. The chief range of apartments, including the House of Lords and the House of Commons, may be inspected on Saturdays and Bank holidays, and the American pressed for time should select a Saturday for visiting both the Abbey and the Palace, an arrangement that permits of these two buildings being the better appreciated in their historical relation and significance. The picture, in the Royal Gallery, of the fatal seizure of the Earl of Chatham when participating in the debate concerning the recognition of the American Republic was painted by John Singleton Copley, a colonist born in Boston. Westminster Hall was until 1882 the chief Court of Justice and within it took place the great State trials of history. Permission to attend the Parliamentary debates is readily obtained.

TRAFFIC AT CHARING CROSS

Reminiscent of Forty-second Street and Fifth Avenue on a busy Saturday afternoon. Buses provide a favorite means of exploring the fascinating quarters of London Town.

Whitehall.

This street bears the name of the palace erected along each side of it by Henry VIII when he abandoned the Palace of Westminster as a place of residence. Whitehall was burnt down in 1698, all save the Banqueting House erected by Inigo Jones in 1620. It was before this building that the scaffold was erected when Charles I was executed and within the Banqueting House (now a naval and military museum) the crown was offered to William of Orange and the Princess Mary on the flight from Whitehall of James II. Opposite is the Horse Guards, originally the guard house of the palace, where a picturesque ceremony is still enacted daily when the guard of Household Cavalry is changed. Whitehall is now lined with important Government offices; in the byway called Downing Street is the official residence of the Prime Minister.

St. James's Palace.

This was built by Henry VIII at the time he built Whitehall and it succeeded that palace as the chief London residence of the sovereign. It stands in St. James's Park, which, with Hyde Park and Regent's Park, forms the remains of the parklands attached to old Whitehall. Foreign ambassadors are still accredited to the Court of St. James, although as a royal residence this palace has been superseded by Buckingham Palace. The brick gateway and a few other portions of Henry VIII's building remain, among modern reconstructions. The changing of the guard here is a ceremony of great stateliness. On the east of the palace is Marlborough House, the residence of Queen Alexandra; on the west Clarence House, residence of the Duke of Connaught (the King's uncle), and on the north York House, the town residence of the Prince of Wales. St. James's Park, which abuts on Charing Cross and is traversed by the processional road called the Mall, is very picturesque—New York has nothing like it in the heart of the city.

Buckingham Palace.

Adjacent to St. James's Palace and fronted by the Victoria Memorial, is the London residence of the sovereign. It originated with a mansion called the Queen's House, which was occupied by George III and Queen Charlotte, and was subsequently rebuilt on a grand scale for George IV and further enlarged for Queen Victoria. It was here that King Edward VII died. The Royal Mews or Stables are attached and may be inspected on written application to the Master of the Horse.

Lambeth Palace.

Confronting the Palace of Westminster, is the residence of the Archbishop of Canterbury and dates in part from the 13th Century. The fine entrance gatehouse, built in 1400 by Archbishop Morton, chief minister of Henry VII, is the oldest example of brickwork in London. The Great Hall (now the Library), the Lollards' Tower, the Guard House, and other portions may be viewed on written application.

The Inns of Court.

These consist of four Inns or Colleges —the Inner Temple and the Middle Temple, which form one precinct; and Lincoln's Inn and Gray's Inn—and constitute the English university of the law. All have fine halls, which may be inspected—the Middle Temple Hall being especially

WHEN YOU GET TO LONDON

MAYBE you'll find London old-fashioned. That is its charm. Maybe you'll think some of the folk old-fashioned and slow.

That's climatic. You will sleep as you never slept before, in England for the first two or three days. There's no need for "hustle" in Britain.

Maybe you'll feel tempted to criticise and compare that I'il ole town with "God's own country."

Britain was His before ours was white-peopled. Maybe you'll think their coinage—pounds, shillings and pence—quaint; their ways strange; their attitude one of restraint.

When the British delegation came to America last year doubtless they thought the same.

There's so much good, bad and queer in all of us, God save us, that it ill-becomes any of us . . . and all that sort of thing.

noteworthy. The Temple Church is remarkable in having been the church of the Order of Knights Templar. All the Inns have picturesque old-world squares and gardens and form a curious oasis in the heart of London. These Inns were closely associated with the early American colonies, the Benchers drafting laws, etc. Another inn is Staple Inn, the eave hanging gables of which, dating from the 16th Century, abut on Holborn.

The City.

The chief public buildings in the City, which is the heart of the business quarter of London, are the Bank of England, the Royal Exchange, and the Mansion House (residence of the Lord Mayor), which stand together in the centre of the City; and the neighboring Guildhall. The Garden Court of the Bank (marking the site of the demolished church of St. Christopher-le-Stocks) is accessible to the public; the Royal Exchange, built originally in the time of Queen Elizabeth, is open to the public daily. The present building dates from 1844 and contains a very interesting series of wall paintings. The Mansion House can be inspected on applying in writing to the Lord Mayor's secretary; it contains several finely appointed apartments. Guildhall is the council house and offices of the Corporation of London. The Great Hall was built in 1426 but was severely damaged in the Great Fire of London and little save the shell of the original structure remains. It is here that the mayoral banquets and other grand functions take place. Its associations are profound, and among other historic events that took place here were the trials of Lady Jane Grey and Archbishop Cranmer. The Library—a very beautiful apartment, in which the Freedom of the City is conferred upon distinguished personages—should also be seen. Besides St. Paul's, there are over fifty churches in the City, thirty-two of them being the work of Wren after the Great Fire. All are of interest; but lack of space debars aught but this passing reference.

Art Galleries.

Chief among these is the National Gallery, containing what is probably the finest collection of paintings in the world, virtually every school being represented. The collections of Italian and Dutch masters are exceptionally fine. Among recent acquisitions are the series of Wertheimer portraits by Sargent, the American member of the Royal Academy. Adjoining this gallery is the National Portrait, with works that may be likened to a dictionary of British biography from the 16th Century onwards. Other notable galleries are the Tate, containing works by British artists, including the chief collection of paintings by Turner; and the Wallace Collection, which is rich in works by Watteau and other French artists, besides paintings by the English masters. The Summer Exhibition at the Royal Academy is the chief periodical event in the sphere of British art and Americans should endeavor to spend an afternoon here.

Museums.

All the State museums contain magnificent collections of their kind. A considerable time would be required for a proper inspection of the multifarious exhibits, however; and, again, in certain cases the collections are analogous with those in the important museums of New York and other American cities. Among other features of especial interest in the museums named are the following.

British Museum.—Green and Roman Sculpture Galleries, particularly the Elgin Room, with the sculptures from the Parthenon; the Assyrian Galleries, with sculptures, etc., from Nineveh and Nimroud; and the great ranges of Egyptian Galleries, reflecting the arts and crafts and the life of Ancient Egypt in every form; the Room of Gold Ornaments, with Greek and Roman jewelry, cameos, paintings, etc.; and the King Edward VII Galleries, the lower range containing a superb collection of mediæval art, the upper range containing the print collection. The Record Office Museum contains the Doomsday Books and among other exhibits are documents relating to the War of Independence.

The South Kensington Museums.—These comprise the Victoria and Albert, with a priceless collection of sculpture, ceramics, furniture, tapestries and carpets, woodwork, ironwork, silversmiths' and goldsmiths' work, etc., and a Picture Gallery in which is the finest collection of works by Constable. This museum has a superb collection of ivories and miniatures. The Science Museum contains machinery of every kind, ship models, etc., and astronomical, chemical, and electrical collections. The Natural History Museum covers every sphere of the animal kingdom, including prehistoric examples; and the Imperial War Museum contains the national War collection.

Streets.

The visitor must needs traverse the important thoroughfares as a matter of course. Many of them have been virtually rebuilt in recent years, in particular the Strand and Regent Street. The former street, contiguous to the river, has become the centre of the Dominion offices. At the western extremity, by Charing Cross, is Craven Street, where, at No. 36, Benjamin Franklin lived for many years while acting as agent for certain of the Colonies during the prolonged negotiations preceding the War of Independence. What an appropriate American consulate or similar office this historic house would make! Regent Street is unique in that it was conceived, planned and built by one man, Nash, the architect to the Prince Regent. It is now in the last stage of reconstruction, from stucco to stone. This is the finest shopping thoroughfare in Europe, with shops of every sort save grocers' and provision merchants'—even the select Bond Street has these. Piccadilly, flanked on one side by the Green Park and on the other by clubs, is another fine thoroughfare—the American Club is here. The adjacent Haymarket, where is the American Express Company, is another street to which the American visitor will be attracted. At its lower end is Cockspur Street, with the shipping offices, amid which is a statue of George III, the last king of the Thirteen Colonies.

FLEET STREET, BYWAY OF COMMERCE AND PRESS ROMANCE

FAMOUS BRITISH LION IN TRAFALGAR SQUARE

Hyde Park.

This favorite rendezvous of Society will, of course have to be seen. The afternoon is the time, the Row being then crowded with riders and all the rank and fashion of the land being gathered about the Hyde Park Corner end. The after-church assembly, called Church Parade, which takes place on Sunday, composes another brilliant spectacle. In Regent's Park is the Zoological Gardens.

Some American Memorials.

A few associations have already been mentioned; there are many others of interest. For the Pennsylvanian there is the church of Allhallows-Barking-by-the-Tower, wherein William Penn (born close by) was baptized; for the New Yorker, St. Ethelburga in Bishopsgate, in which Hudson and his crew attended communion ere setting forth on their first voyage of exploration. For the Georgian in particular and for Wesleyans in general, a place of pilgrimage will be the house in Finsbury where Wesley lived after his return from America, where he had helped Oglethorpe to found Georgia. Attached to this house is the chapel in which he preached and in whose churchyard he lies buried. Opposite is the Armoury, of interest to the Bostonian, because it is the headquarters of the Honourable Artillery Company, some members of which founded in 1638 the Boston Company. To the west, in Roscoe

THE HOUSE IN WHICH SHAKESPEARE WAS BORN

Probably the place to which every Shakespeare devotee dashes on arriving in Stratford is Shakespeare's house, which is about in the centre of the town. It is really two houses, somewhat like our American two-family houses, the one on the east furnished as a museum, the other one being distinguished as the birthplace of Shakespeare.

Street, is an old burial-ground, the solitary headstone in which marks the grave of George Fox, the founder of the Quakers. Fox was in Rhode Island in 1672. If from Hartford, the visitor to London will find in the old church at Esher a memento of William Hooker, the real founder of Connecticut and, with Stone, the founder of Hartford. Hooker was rector of Esher. Over the entrance of the Foundling Hospital (near the British Museum) is a statue of the founder, Captain Coram, who settled at Taunton, Mass., where he gave land for a schoolhouse and books for a library, and later obtained Acts of Parliament for bounties on colonial produce. The good captain is buried in the Foundling Chapel. Not far away, in Tottenham Court Road, is the tabernacle founded by George Whitefield, the minister of Savannah.

Places in the Environs

Among the chief attractions in this connection are Windsor Castle, the most magnificent castle-palace in existence, and the adjacent Eton College, both of which are open to visitors. Among Americans educated at Eton was Thomas Lynch, junior, who signed the Declaration of Independence on behalf of South Carolina. Hampton Court, the splendid palace of Cardinal Wolsey and for two centuries a royal residence, is another noteworthy feature of the riverside, above London. Close to Beaconsfield, the picturesque old Buckinghamshire town that gave title to Disraeli, is the Quaker burial-ground of Jordans, where William Penn lies interred. Nearby is Stoke Poges, of Gray's Elegy, and the home for many years of Penn's descendants. All around London are rustic towns and villages pregnant with associations of the early Colonial days. To write of such associations in London itself would fill a large volume. The American visitor desirous of making such pilgrimmages should get into touch with the Underground Railways, who arrange motor coach itineraries of this sort and will furnish much information not to be found in the general run of books on the subject.

BRITISH ADVERTISING AS FOUNDED ON TRUTH

Honored Names in Field Testify to Success of A.A.C.W. Slogan, But Greater Clean-Up Still Desirable to Render Publicity Above Suspicion

By FREDERICK E. POTTER

(Governing Director, Frederick E. Potter Ltd.)

THE title suggested for this article was slightly different from the above; where the word as appears is was suggested. Just read the phrase both ways and note the difference. It could not be be claimed that all British publicity embodies truthfulness, but with the altered word there is a good text for a lay sermon on the topic.

A great deal of British advertising is undoubtedly founded upon Truth— honest statements about honest goods. If the reader will reflect a moment he will note that the outstanding national successes of advertised goods are of reputable firms employing reputable publicity. Let me mention but a few names in demonstration—Pears, Lever, Cadbury, Fry, Rowntree, Reckitt, Waterman, Bovril, Virol, Sunbeam, Dunlop, Pascall, Pelman, Pomeroy, Pyrene, Lyons, Harrods, etc. etc. This list might be extended considerably. It may be confidently asserted that the products of our leading advertisers are well worthy of the descriptions given of them, and of the position achieved.

Truth in advertising means giving the public a square deal. There must not be any attempt to represent the goods as being what they are not. Exaggeration may sometimes creep in and it does, but there is a distinct difference between the exaggeration of enthusiasm and deliberate misrepresentation. But even so it is better not employed.

In the past many articles have been advertised in a large way and in an extravagant fashion and apparently the publicity campaigns were successful, but the articles had little or no merit in them—and today—where are they? Their very names in many instances are forgotten. Other articles equally largely advertised, and for which also strong claims have been made, are today firmly established in public favor. They have borne out in use the qualities claimed for them.

It is fair to state that British advertising is largely founded on truth. Take up your daily paper and try and point out any half a dozen advertisements which you, as an expert, would stigmatize as false. You will probably have difficulty in finding that number, even though there are perhaps a 100, perhaps 200, perhaps even 300 advertisements in that particular issue.

Many journals now go the length of guaranteeing the articles advertised in their papers. It is not nearly so bold a step as appears at first sight. The majority of manufacturers are intensely concerned in turning out articles of quality, and in satisfying their customers. A chance sale is nothing to them. They look for their reward in constantly increasing business. This can only be hoped for if they have an article of merit to sell. Without such merit they might achieve something resembling success, but it will be only transitory. The price of newspaper space is too high to permit of real success unless from a continuity of custom. One sale is not sufficient and a dissatisfied purchaser is worse than useless.

Some of the articles which I have the pleasure of advertising took years of patient publicity to establish them in their present position. Without merit they would never have got there—nor without advertising. Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen I believe to be far and away the finest fountain pen procurable. I say so in the advertisements, with the fullest confidence that the goods will live up to the description.

I believe that insurance in one of its many phases is a duty which man owes both to himself and his family. I believe also that it is one of the best methods of thrift. Consequently the advertisements of the Sun Life of Canada, issued by my agency, are written as persuasively as possible, to induce people to make the first move towards making up this most admirable method of finance. The strongest encomiums have been made on this publicity by leading experts. And so I could go through a whole list of articles advertised by my agency, the advertising of each of which having behind it the guarantee of a square deal to the purchaser. I would not advise anyone to attempt to advertise an article which has not merit and considerable merit.

There has been a regrettable tendency of late to push business and also charitable appeals by competitions having a "lottery" character. Sometimes they have infringed the law and been stopped. Others have been so near to lotteries as to be difficult to distinguish therefrom. The answers to some could be made in millions of different ways—the handsome monetary rewards practically being due to "chance." This style of advertising is a prostitution of publicity methods, a mere appeal to cupidity, a making use of the spirit of gambling and turning charitable appeals into sporting chances of personal gain. Whatever the hospitals gain in the present, it means sapping those sources of fine feeling which have made the voluntary support of our hospitals and great charities one of the chief glories of the country.

Under no circumstances would I advertise things against the public interest. For instance alcoholic liquors, which have long since been scientifically demonstrated to have little place even in medicine. Medicated wines, so freely pushed, have been the means of leading many into drinking habits. Before Prohibition became the law of the United States some 1,500 journals there had creditably closed their columns to alcoholic announcements. The offers of turf accountants and such like besmirch the pages of certain leading papers. I would call upon my fellow-agents to refuse to place such business, and only wish I could influence the press to cease to further the destructive vice of betting by accepting such advertisements.

While human nature lasts there will always be unattained ideals, practices to be deplored, but we must continue to strive towards the high goal of quality products honestly advertised. Thus shall it be possible to write

British Advertising is founded on TRUTH.

MANY British journals now guarantee advertised articles. Under no circumstances would I advertise things against the public interest.

Liquor and race betting advertisements should not be accepted.

We must strive toward the goal of quality products honestly advertised.

British advertising is founded on truth.

"TREMENDOUS VOLUME OF UNSATISFIED WANTS"

American Goods Are Peculiarly Adapted to Fill Many British Needs, With Success Awaiting House Which First Studies the 12 Market Units Before Entering the Field

By PAUL E. DERRICK

(Managing Director, Paul E. Derrick Advtg. Agency, Ltd., London)

WHAT are the things an American manufacturer should know about the British market? First, he should know just what he should know to succeed in his own market; and he should know that this market is very different from his own.

PAUL E. DERRICK

In other words, he should investigate as carefully as he would at home in commencing a new business, and adopt policies, plans and methods which conform to the facts obtained here.

Two makers of American toilet preparations were interested in the possibilities of the British Isles. Both were highly successful in America.

One consulted a British advertising agent, who told him to advertise to get his share because others had shown the way. This sounded good, because advertising had built his American success to a peak. He advertised; and opened a London branch of his sales organization to fill the flood of orders and take in the the money. That branch was closed when much advertising and American selling brought not enough business to pay office expenses.

The other manufacturer obtained a sound report on the market and methods of developing it. He then framed his plans to fit the facts. He concluded he could use his product unchanged, in practically the same dress, and likewise his skilfully prepared advertising. But he developed distribution by a plan which was new to this country, and which proved so successful that in one year he outstripped every competitor in sales volume. And it was not a relatively expensive plan.

In the first case the manufacturer had good experience and good-looking British advice, to justify the expenditure on the venture. In the second case there was less bromidic opinion, more searching study of essential market facts, and so more justifiable confidence in a seemingly daring scheme built logically on them.

Market research is the first step for everyone. Generalities drawn from venerable experience are not enough, and my 30 years of experience in the British market makes me caution my countrymen against taking, as a substitute for full individual analysis, the generalities to which space limits me in rounding out the advice already given.

The British market is one of over 45,000,000 of population, concerning which there are very few published statistics of any value, even to those who can be trusted to use them safely! This population taken as a whole differs greatly from any equivalent number of Americans, in social habits and prejudices, in occupational and domestic conditions, in tastes, psychology and spending power. Though they have sometimes given the most unexpected welcome to an American product just as made and dressed for Americans, they have in other cases astonished by their refusal of products painstakingly adapted for them.

They are a free trade people. They would as willingly buy foreign goods as British; some say, more willingly, while their own industries languish; yet it will be because they expect they will be cheaper, not as a rule to get better quality. Price for price, with quality equal, they will nevertheless buy what they know to be British goods.

Their legend of British supremacy of quality lives. But it is more effective in perpetuating the conservatism of British manufacturers than in preventing the growth of popular preference for more convenient, more attractive, more standardized American specialties, such as hosiery, toilet goods, tools, canned foods, cars, etc.

This people and their dealers have taken many such things readily, but have refused to have American superior models in men's shirts or more convenient American suspenders.

They are said to have given Congoleum another success, because monopolistic native manufacturers were ultra conservative. And they have given the Arrow enterprise a complete failure because of the ultra-conservatism of the men's wear trade. Although British fountain pen manufacturers have added forceful advertising to their natural advantages, Waterman leads them all. The British shoe industry has thrived on the threat of American invasion, and the invaders are no more with us, except for a few specialized items.

These 45,000,000 are taxed so heavily that their power to buy is seriously limited. This point must be considered at the outset by an American house in its influence on estimates of potential sales. The national taxation per capita is about $85. And the average earning power is considerably below that of the people of the United States, partly owing to the extent of unemployment and the serious curtailment of profitable production.

Roughly two-thirds of the enormous taxation, moreover, is borne by people of larger incomes, in addition to the fact that they bear their full share of the remaining one-third. It may be taken as substantially correct that not more than one-seventh of the people have borne nearly three-quarters of the taxation, and under the budget for 1924, just presented, this disparity of incidence will be increased considerably by the reduction of the taxes on universal necessities such as sugar and tea.

In the case of a product which is not to be classified as a strict necessity, the market must be understood to be limited in number of buyers and in their capacity to buy. Notwithstanding these cautions, wherever you find 6,000,000 of people who are accustomed to want the best and to pay for it, you have a good market for luxury products.

If the product is not so much a luxury as a specialty among necessities or universal conveniences, or if it is designed to economize or render industry or trade more efficient, then the number of potential buyers in Great Britain is much greater though buying power is less. The very fact that the masses of population have not quite developed modern American standards in personal, domestic and social convention, comfort and convenience, expresses a tremendous volume of unsatisfied wants, realized and unrealized, which American products are particularly adapted to satisfy. These masses of potential consumers could not, with their limited buying power, satisfy the whole range of such wants. But their capacity for appreciation of good things and conveniences is just as great, though more latent, than with the American people. And if they cannot satisfy every want they will and do at least respond to the appeal of those things which most attractively present themselves. It would be possible, to judge from the satisfactory business being done in some such lines, to be misled as to popular buying power, simply because the limited buying power is concentrated on a few well-advertised and well-merchandised items.

For example, the bulk of the best apples which come to this country are bought by the very poorest people—those in the congested city areas. Again, in a Northern mining district, a thriving trade is done, even at the period of maximum unemployment, in the sixpenny brand of domestic brass polish, while there is little trade possible with the two-penny brand. The amount of intoxicants consumed is not as great as before the war, but it still averages over $40 per head, and the movies are not complaining of poor business.

Just because the British are well served by railways, great newspaper readers and homogeneous in language, it would be unwise to assume that Great Britain is a single national market which will respond in all sections alike to a single national sales campaign. There are sections less than 100 miles apart in which the two local populations can scarcely understand each other's speech. There has been a high degree of specialization in one area and another, not only on account of grouping of industries, but in many other ways, which account for sectional differences in tastes, in responsiveness, in understanding of the same common English expressions, and in merchandising and buying habits.

Home baking and cooking, for example, are at a minimum in the South, but are practiced more and more generally the farther North one goes, until in Scotland one finds domestic science very old-fashioned. Local practices of this kind need noting before sales estimates or marketing plans are made. If market researech is employed, the first caution should be to analyze the whole market in at least twelve unit sections, if national marketing is being considered.

There is no ready-made road to quick distribution in Great Britain, and a volume of information might be written, describing the unsystematized and unstandardized situation on the trade side of marketing. It is not possible to proceed on the lines of American experience, in dealing with either the wholesale or retail trade in this country. To a large extent, the British retailer is still resistant to branded goods, and, therefore, to appreciation of dealer helps. At the same time, they are familiar with branded goods and dealer helps, and sell the one and use the other practically everywhere. Here enters the typical psychology of the British trader, who persists in continuing to be old-fashioned in his notions, while he may be quite advanced in his practices.

No mistake could be worse than for an American house to assume that a method of sales promotion or a merchandizing stunt which has met with the approval of American retailers will meet with a similar happy reception on this side. The retailer's response here will frequently be to the effect that he has been bothered with too much of it already.

In brief, it could be said that there is a way into the good graces of the retailers here, but it takes careful finding and diplomatic cultivation, and no less diplomatic education. It has to be remembered that the retailers of this country are characteristically the evolution of several retailing generations, not ambitious men who have started up without traditions but with the idea of applying natural and acquired enterprise to the making of money.

The wholesalers in most trades are a necessary factor, but it would be most unwise to look to them for any assistance in introducing a commodity into distribution. According to the still prevailing tradition, the wholesaler does not push any line, and he has so many lines already, in many of which he has special interests, that he is not eager to add to their number, and is definitely prejudiced against even stocking the minimum of any advertised branded lines. The service which can be rendered by the wholesaler to the manufacturer of a new branded line consists of carrying stocks and breaking their bulk for small unit distribution,

FIRST DUTY OF AN ADVERTISER IS TO TELL THE TRUTH

By Sir NEVILLE PEARSON

Head of Great British Publishing House of C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd.

Exclusive to EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THE motto of the associated Advertising Clubs of the world is "Truth in Advertising." It is a slogan that has been deliberately and well chosen to suit a profession which above all others depends for its success upon the honesty with which it is conducted. The day of the catch phrase advertising swindler has passed. At the present time it is up to all advertising men not only to keep the flag of fair play in advertising nailed to the mast, but to see that there is a continued wind of publicity which will cause it to flutter perpetually in the eyes of the world. People who deal in publicity are not out purely for turn over. The basis of publicity is service and the end of publicity is results.

A fact that is often overlooked by advertisers in general is the willingness of those who sell advertising space to take their own medicine.

When the great publishing houses of the world have anything of particular merit which they wish to offer to the public they are among the leaders, for the time being, in the matter of space taking.

It is safe to say that no great achievement which necessitates the co-operation of large numbers of the community can be brought about in these days without recourse to advertising, and what is true of large things is also true of small.

The first duty, as I can see it, of the advertiser of today is to tell the truth in his advertisements. No permanent benefit is ever achieved by a misrepresentation of facts, and I am glad to see that those who control the sources of publicity are every year becoming more and more particular as to the type of advertisement which they allow to be displayed in their columns or on their hoardings.

I feel certain that the Advertising Convention of 1924 will be of immense benefit not only to the Advertising profession but to trade in general in that it will bring to the notice of the trading community more forcibly than ever before the fact that honesty in advertising is the best policy, and also that honesty in advertising is a policy which is bound to bring good results.

in financing credits and making collections. The wholesalers generally will not stock the smallest quantity until demand has been created, to such an extent that he is forced to recognize that he will lose business unless he falls in line.

In original negotiations with wholesalers it is always a difficulty that he anticipates the brand will in the course of time be distributed direct, or else his rate of profit will be cut to the bone, by the process and power of advertising. There are ways which have proven successful in developing retail outlets under these circumstances. But in the development of these methods, there has been much grief to experimenters.

Reliable trade lists and consumer-mailing lists are difficult and, in many cases, impossible to obtain. The lack of information here, as in many other directions, is due to the extreme self-sufficiency and secrecy which limits the exchange of information among business men in this country, as well as to the lack of aggressive service development in trade data. Classified trade lists of the rating agency kind are not to be had. Rating agencies there are, but their service is most disappointing to any American house.

The American who has decided to open up business in this country should not expect any satisfaction from a policy which permits dumping surplus, with possibly later withdrawal of supplies, or who is careless about the personality and British experience of the sales agent or other representative given charge of the business. The wisest first decision in any case will be to obtain the necessary facts precedent to market estimate, by engaging competent research service in this country, under sufficiently broad terms of reference to get really dependable data. In view of the difficulties already outlined, it will be obvious that such data cannot be expected by return mail, because special surveys in most cases have to be made, and because so little statistical data is available. When useful preliminary information has thus been obtained, the American house can decide whether there is no worth-while opening here, or whether it is worth a visit by a principal executive to make his own checking of data and his own investigations, and to decide further steps.

Americans thinking of doing business here often hold back from fear of British taxation. At worst their profits would never be taxed more severely than are those of competitors.

The effects of the British income tax are different according to the method adopted for getting sales representation on this side, and the subject should be fully understood before making any arrangements.

The income tax applies only upon British sales, and then only under certain circumstances. Profits on sales of an American house in Great Britain are exempt from taxation when the following three conditions all exist:

(a) When acceptance of the order takes place abroad;
(b) When payment for the goods is made abroad; and
(c) When delivery of goods to buyer is made abroad.

When a branch business is set up in Great Britain, its net profits after deducting fair and proper trade expenses—are taxed at the flat rate of 4s. 6d. in the pound (22½ per cent.). So where any sort of agent receives consignments on commission, selling either with or without referring orders to America for acceptance, the taxation applies. But if such agent canvasses for orders which are accepted and filled by the American house by dispatch direct to the buyer, payment being received direct, there is then no liability for taxation.

The excess profits tax and corporation profits tax are now repealed, and the income tax, which remains, affects equally any system of representation of an American house. It costs much less for registration of a branch of the house than for its incorporation as a British company, so the registered branch is in many cases advisable at first. But most American houses have incorporated here, and this can be regarded as the natural development as the business increases. There are, on this subject, a number of other considerations which should be covered in the preliminary research report.

These various cautions are derived from experience in successful introduction of many American products, beginning 30 years ago with Quaker Oats, which are now universal household words in this country. I have seen so many failures that these successes only intensify the earnestness of my advice to American houses, that they should look well before they leap. If they look well enough, they will in many cases see something of real interest to them. And not merely brief market analysis, but business research of broad scope and adequate depth, will often mean the difference between success and failure.

ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW

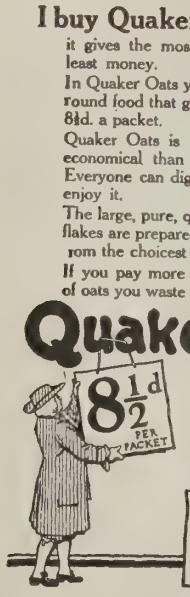
I buy Quaker Oats—because it gives the most nourishment for the least money.



In Quaker Oats you buy the richest all-round food that grows—yet it costs only 8½d. a packet.

Quaker Oats is more nourishing and economical than beef, bacon or eggs. Everyone can digest it. Everyone will enjoy it.

The large, pure, quickly-cooked Quaker flakes are prepared by a special process rom the choicest oats that grow.

If you pay more than 8½d. for a packet of oats you waste money.

BUSINESS IMPROVING IN SOUTH AMERICA

Lawrence Haas, United Press Representative, Urges American Advertisers to Enter Rich Market of Southern Continent

Business in South America is improving; newspapers are progressive and prosperous; but United States advertisers are overlooking this growing market, according to Lawrence S. Haas, manager for the United Press Associations of the West Coast of South America.

Haas arrived in New York recently from Santiago, Chile. He plans to spend about two months at U. P. headquarters, returning then to the Southern hemisphere.

After spending five years in South America, he is enthusiastic about that continent, and declares those who place advertising for American products should turn more and more to this rich field, as yet "barely scratched."

"American press associations operating in South America are splendid propagandists for the United States," Haas declared in an interview with Editor & Publisher.

"Benefits from the missionary work they have carried on should now be reaped by American advertisers.

"There is an increasing sympathy among the Latins towards the United States. Moving pictures are educating the population in American ideas and customs.

"Prosperous parents are sending young South Americans in increasing numbers to the United States for their advanced education. Newspaper men of the South American countries have come to this country for training and experience and are returning to their newspapers, many of them, with pro-U. S. leanings."

These various indications, Haas believes, show the time is now ripe for American advertisers to step in and make money from the South American market.

Of course, to a certain extent, American advertisers have already seized the South American opportunity, Haas explained.

"But the market is not cramped; there is room for many more," he maintained.

The following goods he listed as now being advertised in South American newspapers by U. S. firms:

Toilet articles, automobiles, harvesting machines, light summer cloth, American haberdashery, electrical goods, firearms, hardware, tools, shaving goods, barber supplies, and non-alcoholic beverages.

Since the war, he pointed out, certain leading American advertisers have established a firm foothold in the Southern continent.

Haas, during his five years below the equator, traveled extensively. In the survey, which he detailed to Editor & Publisher, he paid particular attention to the newspapers.

Readers of South American newspapers are on the whole extremely intelligent and take a keen interest in foreign news, in his opinion. Newspaper men have begun to elevate the journalistic profession. The old Spanish style of handling news is giving way to modern methods.

Buenos Aires La Prenza he classed as a daily current history of the world. La Nacion, of the same city, he described as also a very strong, progressive newspaper.

"On the west coast, Chilean newspapers are also on the upswing," Haas declared. "La Nacion of Santiago, established in 1916, now has a circulation of 60,000. Other newspapers in Santiago are El Diaria Ilustrado, Los Tiempos, El Mercurio and Las Ultimas Notias. Valparaiso has two newspapers—La Union and El Mercurio."

Haas spent considerable time in Peru, visiting Lima and the ports of Peitu and Salaverry. At Lima the newspapers are La Prensa, El Comercio, El Tiempo, and La Cronica. He also toured Ecuador, studying commercial and newspaper conditions before returning to the headquarters of the United Press Associations in New York.

WE address ourselves to the leading Manufacturers and Advertising Agents of the United States. The more experienced they are, the more certainly will they recognize their own limitations in regard to developing business in overseas markets.

And so we say: VERNON'S KNOW THE BRITISH MARKET. We have been established for over 40 years; we have played our part in the development of modern advertising, associated with it all the way, and to-day we can justly lay claim to as complete a knowledge and as wide an experience of the British market as it is possible to enlist.

We shall welcome correspondence from Manufacturers and Advertising Agents in the United States who are anxious to market first-class products in the British Isles efficiently.

We believe that an advertising service agent should shoulder the full responsibility for increasing the sales of the commodities which he advertises. He cannot perform his complete duty unless he is able to advise on all questions of selling and on methods of marketing. The policy of the house which he is serving must be his complete concern if he is satisfactorily to serve that house. This conception of our duty is illustrated in every piece of work we undertake.

BRITISH NATION BIG BUYER OF TOILET PREPARATIONS

Success of Present Day Marketing of Soaps, Dentifrices, and Toilet Preparations Due to Desire for Higher Standard of Living, Personal Comfort and Refinement

By LIONEL JACKSON
(Managing Director, G. Street & Co., Ltd., London)

EVEN casual perusal of the British press at once discloses what an immense amount of space is devoted to the advertising of toilet preparations; while inspection of billboards, bus and electric railways tells the same story.

It should be understood that the phrase "toilet preparations" is used here in its widest and most comprehensive sense, and should be taken to include the whole range of toilet articles.

In view of the fact that the British market per capita is relatively small in comparison to that of other countries, it almost passes belief that the whole of the advertised toilet lines can be absorbed profitably, yet, it must be assumed, so far as the leading lines are concerned, that the results are not unprofitable, otherwise the steady flow of advertising would not be maintained. The probable explanation is that the cumulative weight of the advertising is creating an ever-expanding market, limited only by the general purchasing power of the people; in other words propaganda is influencing the public as a whole to be more particular in their toilet and in consequence to purchase more toilet requisites.

Improved education is also doubtless influencing the mind of the young in regard to cleanliness of habits, and in consequence a higher standard of personal cleanliness is rapidly being created. Care of teeth, for instance, is certainly far more considered by the general population today than ten years back, due partly to the influence of school clinics, and partly to the habits of personal cleanliness acquired on War service. If these premises in regard to teeth be correct, then it naturally follows that a wider demand for tooth powder and tooth brushes is created in the minds of those already prepared to accept the principles of personal cleanliness.

Pari-passu with the desire for cleanliness marches a desire for a higher standard of refinement and luxury, consequently a desire for the use of a better class of soap. Hence it follows that a more extended field is thrown open for the marketing of higher grade toilet soaps. Then, too, apart from the clean shave fashion, the wider and more extended use of the safety razor has induced more people to shave themselves; in consequence there is a great consumption of shaving soap per capita.

If then it be that the desire for an higher standard of living and of personal comfort is developing among all classes of the population in the United Kingdom, limited only by the purchasing power of the various grades of society, then it is fair to assume that a desire for the more absolute luxuries is also present, in addition to the desire for what may be termed the necessities, leading to a wider demand for scents, bath, salts, face and toilet creams, etc.

It should be remembered that the now almost forgotten post-war boom, without doubt, gave a decided impetus to the desire for more personal comforts, and during that period the earnings of many hundreds of thousands of people enabled them to gratify this desire; and, while the subsequent slump has unfortunately forced many back to a lower standard of living, nevertheless the desire for more personal comfort still exists, and made even stronger by the fact that for a short period, at any rate, this desire had to some extent been gratified.

This pen picture of the position in regard to toilet preparations may be controverted; it may be alleged that the argument is based on false premises; nevertheless the writer is convinced that taking into consideration the relative numerical smallness of the British market in comparison with the United States, the basis for the present-day marketing of the scores of various toilet preparations is to be found in this desire for a higher standard of living embracing a greater degree of personal comfort and refinement.

To describe in detail the variety of methods employed by advertisers to present their goods to consumers would fill a volume, but in general, more or less conventional lines are followed. In some instances the appeal is made on a basis of quality, in others stress is laid on certain special properties claimed for the article. For instance, some soaps are featured for their value as "beautifiers," others for their antiseptic properties. Toothbrush makers strive to explain the special efficiency of the set of the bristles of the brush or the shape of the handle, etc., while tooth powder and paste makers describe how their preparations prevent pyorrhea, cleanse teeth without wearing the enamel, or in some instances appeal directly to the very young by examples that a child can easily understand. The same line of thought also is apparent in the propaganda issued for face creams, scents, bath salts, beauty treatments, etc., adapted naturally to suit the particular article.

Taking the standard of the advertising put out on behalf of toilet requisites as a whole, a high level is reached both in regard to subject matter, art and technique. Soaps and tooth powder naturally carry the biggest share of the appropriation; their market is the larger and their wastage in use greater than in the case of scents, face creams, etc.

In regard to the media generally used, as may be imagined, this depends on the exact characteristics of the particular article; in a general way newspapers, periodicals and magazines are used, and also outdoor publicity. In regard to this latter form, it is of interest to note that some of the most attractive posters on the British billboards are those of toilet soaps, and further, the fact that many of these are to be discovered in quite poor-class districts proves that the manufacturers believe, or have reason to believe, that the market is a wide flung one. Distribution is attended to with minute care; it could scarcely be otherwise when dealing with such highly competitive lines. Stock of all leading lines are to be found in practically every shop, ranging from the big department stores to the small village shop, as often as not the manufacturer having his own sales staff.

Another side of the problem, packing, has also been seriously studied, and throughout the whole range of toilet articles, packages are thoroughly in keeping with the class of goods, labels and cartons attaining a very high level of design and printers' art. The result of this care is self-evident by the handsome displays of toilet preparations to be seen on all hands.

Before passing to general conclusions, there are one or two curious points worth mentioning; one is the very apparent decrease of publicity on behalf of hair lotions and tonics, which, in pre-war days were if anything, more prominently advertised than the toilet soaps, teeth preparations; etc. of today, and the other, the very limited extent to which hair brushes and combs are advertised. How to account for the lessening of the former, and the smallness of the latter is difficult. Possibly the spirit duty has had effect on the hair lotion business, but as regards hair brushes, it is difficult to assign a reason. Can it be lack of enterprise—trade prejudice—or a thought that all is

FIGHTING THE CAUSE OF THE BRITISH COUNTRY NEWSPAPERS

88-Year-Old Newspaper Society Enables Them in Combination to Hold Their Own Against the National Press, to Negotiate with Unions, and Make a Common Stand for Protection

By VALENTINE KNAPP
DIRECTOR, SURREY COMET

THE interests of the Fleet Street press are looked after by the Newspaper Proprietors Association; those of the provincial press of England and Wales are presided over by the Newspaper Society, a body in the 88th year of its existence. The newspapers of Northern and Southern Ireland also align themselves with the Society. If there was a time some years ago when age might have been said to have "withered" the activities of the Society, it certainly cannot be alleged today that "custom" has staled the "infinite variety" of the work it undertakes on behalf of its members.

VALENTINE KNAPP

Three years ago new life was put into its old bones by a four-handed amalgamation under which it partnered itself with associations of northern and southern groups of newspaper owners, and another organization which had theretofore conducted wage negotiations on behalf of the provincial side of the industry; and thus there became unified under the Society's banner all newspaper interests outside London.

At the same time a new constitution was adopted which gave to its Council a thoroughly representative character based on geographical lines, and under a new and highly energetic secretariat it has continued to grow in power and activity until today it stands as an excellently organized and most active industrial proprietorial body.

The sum of its activities would make a long catalogue. It stands to promote and defend the interests of its members whenever and however affected. In this respect it fulfills the same office as every other association of proprietory interests. The measure of its new-born vigor is to be assessed by the manner in which its members react to its efforts on their behalf and respond in terms of active personal co-operation.

The basis of its constitution is the local associations of groups of counties which send representatives to the central body. These associations have developed and are maintaining a keen interest in the Society's work. They meet at intervals in some provincial town of their area, discuss current business which may have been remitted to them from head office, exchange notes in matters of common interest arising locally, and send their reports and resolutions to the General Secretary. These local meetings are the means of the development of the best relationships between local newspaper proprietors—in itself a great asset—tend to open up new means of co-operation for the general benefit, and are the indispensable arteries of communication between the branches and the central office.

This co-operative spirit is tending to grow in more than one direction. There is co-operative effort to obtain national advertising. Here and there has been noticed among national advertisers a very bad symptom—the idea that the national newspapers are the best, or only necessary field for their advertisements.

The idea can only proceed from imperfect information of the peculiar hold which provincial journals, daily and weekly, have over their respective areas. This place the national newspapers can never take, however their circulations be expressed in millions. The provincial daily or the provincial weekly goes right into the homes of the people and stays there until each member of the family has done with it; when it is passed on to neighbors. It is a poor "rag" when it gets there, doubtless, for it has been very badly thumbed, but it is the thumbing process which makes the provincial newspaper's value as an advertising medium. Incidentally, and this is important, no one knows so well as the provincial newspaper publisher that the weekly newspaper habit—the habit of taking the weekly paper published in the daily provincial office, or the regular county or local weekly—is still the only newspaper habit which tens of thousands of people in rural districts have ever had, though undoubtedly the Sunday newspaper habit is growing upon them.

Yes, the provincial newspaper man is out to rebut the overweening pretensions of the national daily, just because the facts are with him. Therefore he must succeed.

Not much is heard of co-operative purchase of newsprint, for the standardization of news sizes is not yet practical politics, or likely to be. However desirable standardization may be, in this country it is not a thing even of the immediate future.

The central office is always ready to assist its members in local troubles with trades unions; though true it is to say that, were the troubles that arise in the rural areas the only clouds that darken the industrial firmament in the newspaper world, then that firmament would cover a very peaceful and contented people. Left to themselves the local proprietor and his men would seldom have serious differences, and conciliation committees would go out of business.

Generally speaking, however—and we are happy to be able to testify it—the relations between the Newspaper Society and the trades unions are in excellent temper; and, if the echoes of the last strike can yet be faintly heard, it is generally regarded as a regrettable incident, not to be "unadvisedly, lightly, or wantonly enterprised" or repeated.

Incidentally the occasion was the first on which the industry was asked to combine in its own defence on a definite point of principle, and it demonstrated itself effectually as a puissant fighting force. Far distant be the day when another call-to-arms shall be necessary.

In wage negotiations the Society takes joint action with the Federation of Master Printers, inasmuch as some 80 per cent of its members, besides being newspaper proprietors, are also general printers. The association, in the circumstances, is mutually advantageous, as is all but generally now agreed. As a result of this association the Newspaper Society has the privilege of membership of the Joint Industrial Council of the Printing and Allied Trades. In this body all that concerns the common interest of the masters and the men, all that makes for healthy conditions of employment and the common advantage of both sides of the industry, is brought up for consideration.

And here also, when trouble is brewing; when, as appears, the last effort has been made outside to prevent a break in mutual understanding and good will, are troubles tabled, and seldom has it been that they are not here composed, either by the empanelling of that useful institution, a conciliation committee, or by the J. I. C. itself.

BRITISH AUTO MAKERS TURN TO DAILIES WITH BIG MARKET UNTOUCHED

Quality Is Stressed, Rather Than Price, in Advertising—Car Ownership Represents Steps in Social Scale, and There Are Less Than 500,000 Owned in England

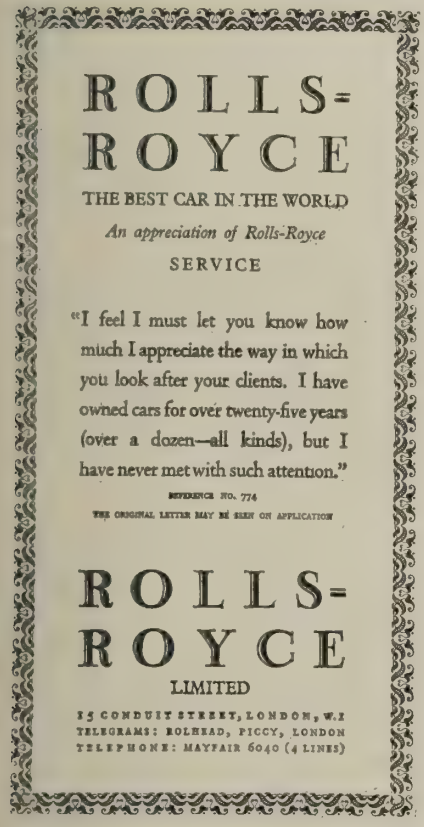
By ERNEST H. GODBOLD

MOTORING in England is on the eve of big developments and current motor advertising reflects this very accurately. We have an excellent technical press devoted to the interests of a fast growing motoring public. An ordinary issue of one of the most popular of the motoring journals carries well over 100 pages of advertising and this number is even more than doubled during the annual Motor Show period.

ERNEST H. GODBOLD

Up to the present the illustrated society and sports weeklies have provided one of the chief links between the maker and the car buyer. Advertising in the daily press has not hitherto been used to nearly the same extent as in the United States, but many of the leading car makers are now conducting national campaigns with great success; and the satisfactory results they have achieved are likely to create an increased and consistent motor advertising in the daily press. Till now, too, posters have been used very little, although makers of tires, gasoline and oils have used roadside signs to an extent that has called forth popular disapproval and protest.

Those of our trans-Atlantic friends who are inclined to criticise English car advertising—and helpful criticism is always welcome—should bear in mind that just as each country has evolved cars to suit its own requirements so the methods employed to sell those cars must differ. In England the possession of a car still marks a distinct step in the social scale—or perhaps it would be more true to say that the various grades of cars constitute a series of steps in that scale.



This state of affairs has had a marked influence on car advertising. It tends to place a premium on the reputation of the maker. It is doubtful whether in any country in the world could one make of car have attained such complete distinction and eminence as the British Rolls-Royce. The popularity of the Rolls-Royce forms a fascinating study for the psychologist. It is so complete that it undoubtedly reacts upon Rolls-Royce sales among a class of buyer to whom the acclamation of the public and the patronage of the newly rich do not appeal.

In point of fact, there is very little to choose from an engineering point of view, between the half-dozen finest British cars. Daimler, Armstrong-Siddeley, Napier, Lanchester, Vauxhall, Bentley, Sunbeam—the exact list would be a matter of endless controversy—all are built with cost as a secondary consideration. Particularly among the big cars is it true that they are sold on name and not on price. Thus the outstanding characteristic of English car advertising is the emphasis accorded to the name plate.

A glance through the pages of an English motoring journal will show that, as a general rule, the "weight" of an advertisement display is in inverse ratio to the price of the car advertised. While the most expensive cars adopt a classic style of layout to convey an impression of dignity and exclusiveness, heavy displays and headings of the scare variety are not unfrequently used for the cheapest cars. Most advertisements for the highest grade cars are examples of what may be called restrained display. In some cases no illustration is used, the effect being secured by careful settings in choice types, of which incidentally there has been a revival during the last two years.

But it is between the two price-extremes, in the great field of medium-power cars where competition is keenest, that we find the best, most constructive advertising. Even here there is no primary insistence upon price. The quality that means long life and low running

BRITISH PRESS HISTORY GOES BACK 200 YEARS

Country Press of Great Britain, Enjoying Unique Confidence and Influence, Has Grown Out of Newspapers Founded as Local News Sheets Long Ago—Most of These Exist Today

By T. McAUSLAND

THE newspaper man from overseas is apt to base his opinion of the press of the British Isles on his casual acquaintance with the London newspapers coming under his personal notice. This is unwise, for the newspaper press of the metropolis is totally dissimilar from that of the rest of the country.

The morning and evening papers published in London cover a wide area, the former being on sale on the day of publication at distant towns and cities 400 and 500 miles distant, and the latter circulating in an area 100 miles around London.

The population of the British Isles is well served by its press. Apart from the big circulations of the London morning, evening, weekly and Sunday newspapers, about 200 weekly newspapers, embracing many localized editions, are issued in the London and suburban towns. In England there are published over 50 morning and 90 evening newspapers, Scotland has seven morning and 8 evening papers, Ireland 8 morning and 6 evening, Wales 3 morning and 6 evening. In the Channel Islands, Jersey publishes 1 morning and 1 evening, and Guernsey has 2 evening newspapers. The Isle of Man has 1 daily.

The country papers published (some mid-week, but most of them on Friday or Saturday) in England number over 1,200, of which about 25 per cent are localized editions. A variety of titles are used, the favorites being Advertiser, Gazette, Chronicle, Herald, Observer, to which there is generally prefixed the name of the local town.

Scotland issues about 100 weekly newspapers, the names most frequently used being the Herald and the Advertiser.

Ireland has a much larger number of weeklies, many of them being remarkable for the titles they bear such as: Independent, Democrat, Guardian, Vindicator, Whig, Witness, Tribune, Constitution, Examiner, Eagle, Argus, Recorder, Freeman, Moderator, Champion, Sentinel, Messenger, National, and Liberator.

In Wales, there are over 100 weekly newspapers published, many of the country papers here adopting names in the Welsh language.

The newspapers published in the large provincial cities such as Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, Bristol, Nottingham, Newcastle, Cardiff, Plymouth, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen, Dublin and Belfast are valuable properties cleverly edited and admirably managed and produced, and held in high esteem by their readers.

All of them maintain, in Fleet Street, London, editorial and commercial offices with private telegraph and telephone communications with headquarters enabling them to send forward the latest news service, and when need be, to communicate advertisement copy and instructions. The newspapers embraced in the territorial areas named rank as first class in the schedule of national advertisers placing business on the grand scale. Certain of them are frequently chosen for launching of localized schemes in large industrial centres where a concerted effort is made in advertising and salesmanship to test out the selling value of a new line of goods, a try-out method of publicity which in recent years has grown enormously on this side.

The newspapers of Great Britain are representative of the solidity of the people of these islands. In a word, they are John Bullish. They play an important part in the politics of the country, and in the religious, social and recreative life of the communities they serve. However bright and cleverly edited they may be, and they mostly are, they are loath to make alteration and a departure from their make-up and method of presenting the news their readers have been long familiar with.

Splash methods are abhorred, black-faced headings are tabooed. There is no riotous look about their make-up. Everything is presented with dignity and even in this way little is lost in effectiveness.

The country weekly editor has his own views, and knows well how to express them. His area embraces a public that includes members of our old nobility, as well as the tiller of the land. He sees that they are equally supplied with news of interest to both; there is no writing up to the one or down to the other. The old English family—be it that of Lord or Squire—commands in his columns that respect that still is its due reward for services rendered to those less fortunate in the social scale. Its hunting and its social fixtures are fully recorded as are its deeds of charity and kindness. The worker has complete attention paid to his activities, be they what they may. However small townish the local newspaper may appear to the outsider it lives as an important factor in the life of its own particular community.

The country weekly newspapers of the British Isles make a varied collection in their size, circulation and carrying capacity of advertisements. Most of them are of eight large pages with sales in a radius embracing 50,000 to 100,000 of a population. Some of them are small four-page sheets produced by the local printer to serve the needs of the reading public in a district numbering but a few thousand people.

In larger centres of population, the local newspaper of the town may issue two, four and six localized editions for towns within a certain radius of headquarters, the localized issues carrying, in the majority of cases, the advertisements in the principal newspaper of the series, with a liberal instalment of its general news, but making a strong feature of local reports and matters of particular interest to the district catered to.

Taken in bulk, the majority of the country weeklies are excellently conducted, fully alive to the opportunities they have for serving the communities where they are published. Their news service in its localization runs to generous proportions, their advertisement space is eagerly sought after by the shopkeepers, auctioneers, estate agents and others in the country.

The country newspaper editor can obtain many features from service agencies in London or from one firm. He can get partly printed newspapers—the four inside pages with his own newspaper heading, including serial fiction, articles of general interest, "A London Letter," political notes, etc. This enables him at small cost to print the additional four pages of local news and advertisements on his own machines and give his readers a complete newspaper.

Other agencies and sellers of service offer him mat columns of interesting matter, syndicated London letters, political articles and gossip, dress and fashion features, notes on new books and their authors, the plays produced and the theatrical gossip of London, articles on gardening, poultry and agriculture. With the development of the radio in Britain, "wireless gossip" has recently been added to the supply of the weekly newspaper feature available for the provincial editor. The advertisement display of the country weekly (which can also have regularly stereo columns of advertisements supplied from London) seldom boasts of a display of the latest type faces, except where supplied by the advertiser or his agent in stereo ready for use.

Many of the English country weeklies of today have interesting histories and not a few of the most successful newspapers published in Great Britain date their commencement from a country weekly first issued over 200 years ago.

The first recorded date is that of 1690, when the Worcester Postman was published. This is now Berrows' Worcester Journal (1709) and was the forerunner of the Worcester Daily Times, established in 1880. The name of Henry Berrows was added to the newspaper in 1753.

In 1710 the Nottingham Weekly Courant appeared, which is now known as the Nottingham Journal.

In 1713 was established the Stamford Mercury, now the Lincoln, Rutland & Stamford Mercury; in 1713, also the British Chronicle was founded and is today the successful Hereford Journal, and in the same year was published the Bristol Postman, now the Bristol Times & Mirror, a title taken in 1865.

In 1714 appeared No. 1 of the Norwich Mercury, now advertised as "one of the best illustrated weekly papers published in Great Britain."

The Kentish Post, now the Kentish Gazette and Canterbury Press, started in 1717, and in 1720 there was issued the Northampton Mercury and the Gloucester Journal, both of which are alive today and bear the same titles. 1723 saw the beginning of the Reading Mercury which has added to its title "and Berks County Paper, read by the titled classes, the gentry, the farmers and their servants and professional and business men."

In 1725 was founded the York Courant, the forerunner of the Yorkshire Daily Herald (the only morning paper published in the City of York) which commenced in 1874 and was followed in 1882 with the Evening Press. 1729 saw the first appearance of the Salisbury Journal, now the Salisbury & Winchester Journal; in 1730 Adams Weekly Courant, known today as the Chester Courant & Advertiser for North Wales.

In 1732 Drewry's Derby Mercury was issued and continues as the Derby Mercury. In 1737 the Belfast News-letter was first published; and the Sherborne & Dorset Mercury, which is now the Western Gazette (Yeovil) claiming to be "the premier provincial newspaper of England." In 1741 the Birmingham Gazette first appeared. 1744 saw the commencement of the Cambridge Chronicle, now the Cambridge Chronicle & University Journal published mid-weekly and making a feature of illustrations.

The Aberdeen Daily Journal was issued in 1748, and a few years ago was incorporated with the Aberdeen Free Press, started in 1853. Jackson's Oxford Journal appeared in 1753 and in 1910 became known as the Oxford Journal Illus-

The Value of INFLUENCE!

INFLUENCE is the most valuable quality with which any newspaper can endow the announcements of its advertisers.

Influence MUST be earned by a newspaper. There is no other way of acquiring it. It is the natural result of fidelity to principle, courage of conviction, and tenacity of purpose.

Influence means the respect of the readers and the community for a newspaper. It creates an authority which applies to every announcement in the newspaper—the authority of credibility and reliability.

Influence is the keynote of the "Morning Post." It is the leading Conservative newspaper of Britain. It is read by all the people who have money to spend and who are ready to buy articles of good quality which are advertised in its columns.

You add Influence to your appeal therefore when you advertise in

HOW SHREDDED WHEAT MADE GOOD IN BRITISH MARKET

Formerly a "Half Success," This Cereal Has in Three Years Been Boosted Into a First Line—One Free Sample Offer Produced 50,000 Replies

By FRANCIS H. BURN

(Director, Pratt & Co., Advertising, Ltd., London)

THE unusual success achieved by Shredded Wheat during the past two or three years has been one of the most widely discussed topics of the advertising world. One might say that only yesterday Shredded Wheat was the food of comparatively few of the British people, but today you will find it in almost every home in this country. To what has the success been due?

Three years ago large stocks had accumulated in the warehouses here following a period of excess production in America and the first scheme of publicity was specially designed to clear these goods speedily.

This experience proved from the outset that the papers with national circulation paid us best and for that reason we have always given these journals preference in our campaigns.

A feature of the advertising has been the use of large space. I believe that not only do the public respond better to a large, strong announcement, but the wholesaler and retailer are more impressed and influenced.

Many of our advertisements carried an invitation to the public to apply for a free sample packet of Shredded Wheat on the assumption that after our advertisements had told their story it was wise to give the reader an opportunity to try the food without expense. My clients found that excellent results followed this policy, for they sent a letter to 2,000 of the applicants and enclosed a special stamped postcard for reply. This showed that no less than 70 per cent, of those who had had samples sent them had become regular users.

But this offer of free samples also enabled us to ascertain which papers were the best for our purpose. The number of people who applied for samples totalled hundreds of thousands but the highest number of replies received from any single advertisement was from the News of the World, where we had nearly 50,000 replies. costing on an average less than 2d. each.

Although press advertising has been the main form of publicity, others have been used. We have had very favorable results from billboards.

Window dressing competitions have proved a great help to the advertising. Hundreds of grocers responded to the invitations to send in photographs of their windows and numerous substantial prizes were awarded. This scheme fully justified itself.

At the close of 1922 Mr. Bryce, the present managing director, informed his staff that if a certain number of cases were sold during 1923 the parent company would erect a factory in Great Britain. The goal aimed at was actually some 50 per cent. over any previous year's record but all were enthusiastic and backed by a strong, well designed advertising campaign the sales were increased by over 80 per cent. In fact the goal that had been set was passed early in November.

No time was lost in taking the first steps towards erecting the new factory, for very soon after an excellent site of about 7 acres was acquired at Welwyn Garden City, about 20 miles from London, and plans for the new factory were being drawn up. At the end of the year whole pages were taken in daily papers thanking the public for their support and announcing the coming erection of the new factory.

The sales of Shredded Wheat are still rising and we believe will continue to rise for years to come; for as the public get to know Shredded Wheat better they will buy more of the food. It has won general favor and become the principal breakfast food in hundreds of thousands of British homes.

Shredded Wheat has been shown at many exhibitions. Visitors to the British Empire Exhibition will be able to see an excellent display of the goods in the Canada building where a miniature machine is actually shredding the wheat grains to demonstrate to the public the absolute purity of the food.

The success of this campaign has been greatly helped by the assistance my clients have given me by furnishing day by day details of the sales. It is therefore possible to gain valuable information as to the copy that "pulls" best and to lay plans accordingly.

Recently I made a graph for the last two years showing the quantity of Shredded Wheat sold month by month and the cost of advertising. The result was one of the finest vindications of the value of advertising that I have ever seen.

100,000 Free Packets of Shredded Wheat for 'News of the World' Readers

100,000 trial packets of Shredded Wheat have been set aside specially for free distribution amongst News of the World Readers. If you have not yet had an opportunity of trying this famous whole-wheat food. we invite you to fill in the coupon below at once and post it to-day, so that you will be sure of securing one of these packets.

We make this offer knowing that an actual trial will convince you of the worth of Shredded Wheat far better than a whole volume of printed matter. You will realize at once the extraordinary economy of this food as compared with other cereals—the delightful crispness and pure flavour of the whole-wheat shreds—the ease with which the "biscuits" can be digested and assimilated. You will find Shredded Wheat in every way a better breakfast dish than porridge—and you will like it for luncheon and supper, too.

Shredded Wheat is the best value in cereals on the market. It offers the most real food and the most nourishment for the least money.

Why the Bee chose the Hexagon

THE problem of the bee was to divide up its honeycomb into compartments with the minimum waste of room. Circles, Squares, Triangles, all meant extravagance. So, with amazing instinct, it correctly chose the Hexagon as representing the most judicious and economical use of space.

IN deciding to adopt the Hexagon as its symbol, the House of Barney desires to identify itself with the efforts of Service Agents in this country to use the costly advertising space in the Press and on the Hoardings, more and more advantageously in the interests of Advertisers.

As the "New Agency with 25 Years' Experience," the House of Barney feels that it can be of special assistance to Advertisers who wish to plan out their appropriation to produce the best results. Mr. E. W. Barney would welcome a talk with any Advertiser or Advertising Agent from overseas.

CO-OPERATIVE MARKETING SCHEMES A POST-WAR DEVELOPMENT

Problems that Affected Whole Industries Created Advertising to Improve Basic Marketing, Lighting, Scotch Tweeds, Tomatoes, Milk, and Paint Are Examples so Treated

By REGINALD J. SYKES

(Principal, London Press Exchange, Ltd.)

A SIGNIFICANT feature of British advertising during recent years has been the development of co-operative, or non-competitive, marketing schemes.

Some of these campaigns have created entirely new advertisers, for example: the British Commercial Gas Association; the Scottish Woolen Trade Mark Association; the British Glasshouse Produce Marketing Association; the National Milk Council; and the Association of British Fisheries. It is remarkable that these associations among advertisers are all, with the notable exception of the first-named, of post-war origin.

Prior to the war, British manufacturers were enjoying considerable prosperity. Credit was good; taxation was low; the general standard of living was high; markets were abundant. As its aftermath, the war created intense nationalisms, greatly depreciated the buying power of our chief customers, gave an immense impetus to the manufacturing capacity of Great Britain's competitors, and greatly raised the cost of living. A considerably increased basic wage throughout industry thereby became necessary; and the price per unit of the products of our factories was proportionately increased.

The ethnographical and geographical position of Great Britain differs radically from that of all other countries in the world. As a manufacturing nation, these islands carry a population of 672 per square mile, while, for example, the United States bear only 32, and Germany —Great Britain's chief European competitor—bears only 120 per square mile. It is therefore economically imperative for Great Britain to dispose of more than 50 per cent of her output abroad—and, at the world price.

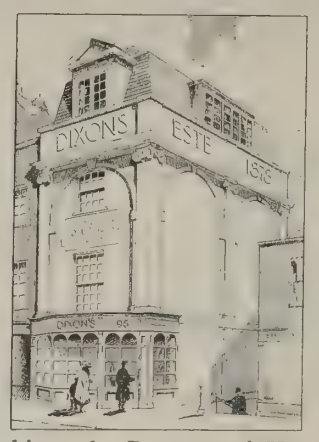
It became obvious, therefore, that any economy which could be wisely introduced into Great Britain's industrial methods, or into her system of marketing would give new life to her industries. The growth of co-operative advertising and marketing schemes dates from the realization of this simple truth.

In every industry, consideration is being given to plans which, while not interfering with the individual enterprise of manufacturers and growers, will give to them a common platform of appeal to the markets of the world, and, within defined limits, a common sales force and marketing policy.

These were the general considerations which guided growers and manufacturers of vision in the formation of marketing associations, and advertising agents have been consulted throughout as to questions of procedure, the readiness of individual firms to co-operate and the raising of funds.

The first great co-operative campaign was that started before the war by the British Commercial Gas Association. To increase the consumption of gas as an illuminant and cooking agent by means of advertising appeared at the time to be difficult, but this association realized that whereas it was impossible for any one company to advertise gas—its market being limited by the extent of its own mains—the difficulty could be surmounted by each company contributing to a central fund and therewith advertising to the entire community, served by the whole industry.

From the first, the campaign of the British Commercial Gas Association met with success, and the past few years have seen an unprecedented increase in the consumption of gas for domestic and industrial purposes throughout the whole country, despite the increasing use of electricity and its growing competition.



Some of the most important advertising in connection with the British Empire Exhibition has been that of the B. C. G. A., not only by means of a very remarkable exhibit in the Palace of Industry at the Exhibition itself, but by an extensive campaign in the press and on billboards.

Following upon the information of the parent Association come the National Benzol Association, the London Coke Committee, the British Sulphate of Ammonia Federation and the National Gas Council.

Another example is that of the Scottish Woolen Trade Mark Association, where the Scotch tweed industry, by similar action, has protected Scotch tweeds from competition, and, by well-planned advertising, has protected the public against inferior merchandise and made Scotch tweeds definitely fashionable for men's suits and overcoats and women's costumes. An outstanding feature of the success of this campaign is that it has held the industry together during very trying—indeed abnormal—times, and has opened up the American market in a remarkable way. The growing popularity of golf, especially in America, has been taken full advantage of, and every golfer now knows that he cannot play the "royal and ancient game" in Scotland unless clad in Scotch tweeds. So much was the American market influenced by the British advertising that a considerable sum has been appropriated and is being used for this market with most gratifying results.

A different series of co-operative campaigns is that which deals with the problems of increasing the demand for perishable foodstuffs.

The first campaign of this type was that of the British Glasshouse Produce Marketing Association. This association was formed for the purpose of educating the public to a proper appreciation of the superior merits of British tomatoes in order that the English growers might be able to compete with the Dutch growers, whose produce, though inferior, can be imported and sold here at a lower price. This campaign has now ended its second year of operation. It is supported by over 700 individual growers, and the number is increasing. The advertising advisers to the growers strongly urged upon them to adopt, as one fea-

A GREAT EMPIRE SERVICE AT A GREAT EMPIRE EXHIBITION

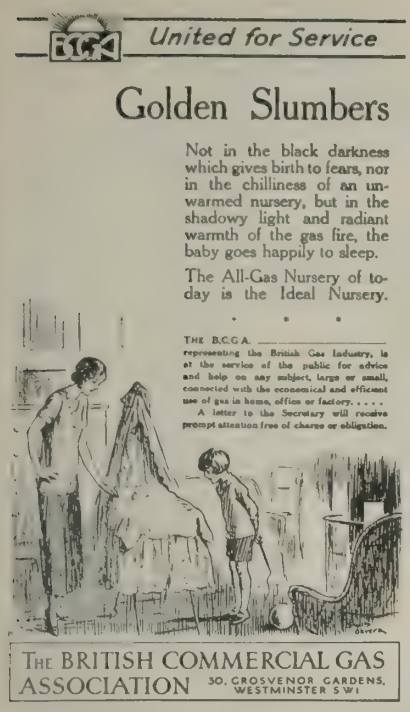
All industries are public services; but this is true in a special sense of the British Gas Industry — one of the oldest established, yet most actively growing, Public Services of the Empire.

In addition to supplying over 8,000,000 households and business premises with necessities of life — Light, Heat and Power — the Gas Industry in time of war, proved itself vital to our safety, as the source of essential High Explosives. It is now, in constantly growing measure, helping to solve some of the national and civic problems of daily life; for example:

Coal Conservation, Smoke Abolition, Better Housing, Adequate and Efficient Domestic Service, Increased, Improved and Cheapened Production.



Gas—the purified Spirit of Coal—is not only a very economical and efficient Illuminant. It is well on the way to become "The Fuel of the Future." Practical evidence in proof of these statements will be found at the ture of the improved methods of marketing their products, the packing of the tomatoes in non-returnable boxes in place of the returnable baskets hitherto used, a practice which was being followed by their Dutch competitors. It was a revolutionary proposal and one which at the time was not seriously considered by the growers generally.

Of all co-operative advertising campaigns during the year 1922, no compaign made a stronger impression on the public than that on behalf of British tomatoes, and there could have been few people in the United Kingdom at the end of the season who did not know that the tomato growers were advertising British tomatoes, despite the quite small appropriation; while the introduction of the non-returnable wooden boxes greatly increased the goodwill of retailers and greengrocers, and brought many new customers.

A campaign which promises to be the most ambitious of its kind is that of the National Milk Council. The method of this campaign is not unfamiliar to the States of New York and New Jersey. The Council is representative not only of that considerable portion of the community that has to do with the production and distribution of milk, and over 20,000 milk distributors, but of those government departments and public bodies and associations interested in this important product of daily life.

It will be realized that the task of bringing together for common action something like 100,000 people has been no light one. However much he may subscribe to it in theory, the British farmer does not readily embrace practically the principle of co-operation. Meetings of farmers and distributors all over the country were arranged, and a representative of the advertising agency devoted the whole of his time for the first six months of last year in addressing these meetings on behalf of the National Milk Council.

On September 30 last, it was agreed that an advertising contribution of one penny on every 12 gallons of milk sold should become automatic.

The effect of this campaign is to stabilize the consumption of fresh milk, eliminate waste, and permit the surplus to be absorbed for manufacturing purposes, while also the stabilization of prices will gradually permit of a reduction in the price of milk.

Other important co-operative campaigns which are now commencing are those of the Association of British Fisheries and of the National Federation of Associated Paint, Color and Varnish Manufacturers of the United Kingdom.

Creating a demand.

British Fisheries are convinced that a campaign of educational copy with a selling "punch" will have a marked effect in increasing distribution of their products. The paint manufacturers' drive had a counterpart in the United States where the paint industry advertised successfully with the slogan, "Save the Surface and You Save All."

In conclusion, it may be said that there is every reason to believe that the way lies open for a number of other co-operative advertising campaigns. Indeed, co-operation between manufacturers for the solution of their basic problems in all the more important industries of this country is not merely sound economic policy—it is an economic necessity. It is gratifying to perceive that this principle is receiving every day wider recognition, and merchants and wholesalers who have generally been found to be in opposition to such schemes are now themselves feeling their way towards similar action, and are giving to them their sympathetic assistance.

FIGHTING BATTLE OF THE COUNTRY PRESS stabilization period arranged to the end of last year, shows a little unsteadiness, but the genial zephyrs of spring and common sense will probably keep the indicator for some time to come in its present satisfactory position, so necessary for the maintenance and development of business.

Among other subjects looming large on the agenda of the Society's Council is that of radio broadcasting. While the British Broadcasting Company continues linked up in financial matters with the General Post Office, newspaper interests will consider they have the right to be consulted about the broadcasting of news; and, though unwilling to place any undue hindrance in the way of the development of this new means of communication, will hold that their interest must not be overridden or overlooked. In this matter the Society works harmoniously with the London newspaper proprietors, speaking together with them as one voice on behalf of the newspaper press.

The law has its special pitfalls for the newspaper man, and when our members are in trouble they turn naturally to the Society and its Honorary Solicitor for advice. Some are so wise as to enquire beforehand, and thus avoid trouble. The Society also keeps a vigilant eye upon our lawmakers, and through its Parliamentary Committee and Parliamentary Agent does useful service to the Press.

Of many another line of usefulness followed by the operations of the Society there is not space to speak. We end as we began with the assertion that, as reconstituted the Society has become a factor making powerfully for the betterment of the industry and of those employed in it as time will hereafter show.

London Calling!

The warm welcome awaiting the great American delegation to the International Advertising Convention will reflect the welcome which always awaits good American goods upon the British market.

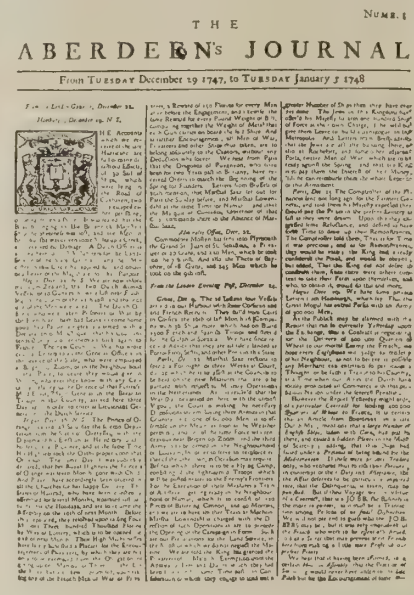
Essex Chronicle, which is published by the proprietors of the Essex Herald, first issued in 1800.



In 1764 also appeared the first numbers of the Newcastle Chronicle (now Newcastle Weekly Chronicle) and the Sherborne, Dorchester & Taunton Journal, the three towns title now covered by that of the Western Chronicle.

Two Irish newspapers came next on the list of the old-established—the Limerick Chronicle (1766) which bears the same title today, and the Leinster Journal (1767), now called the Kilkenny Journal. In 1768 the Kentish Herald, now published mid-weekly in Canterbury (the Cathedral city) as the Kent Herald.

Two county newspapers were started in 1770—the Berkshire Chronicle (which bears still the same title) and the Hereford Mercury & Farmers and Hereford Stockbreeders'. The year 1772 saw the beginning of five newspapers: The Morning Post (London), the Shrewsbury Chronicle, the Hampshire Chronicle (all three retain their original titles); the Exeter Gazette, now the Devon & Exeter Daily Gazette, and the Londonderry Journal, the latter now published three times weekly as the Derry Journal.

In 1775 first appeared the Chester Chronicle, now Chesire & North Wales Advertiser. The Clare Journal commenced in 1776 and has been called the Saturday Recorder & Clare Journal since 1917, having been amalgamated with the Saturday Recorder, first published in 1885.

The history of the Glasgow Herald, "the largest, most influential and greatest advertising medium out of London," dates back to 1782, when the foundation of this valuable morning newspaper and its associated journals can be traced to the founding of the Glasgow Advertiser.

THE ABERDEEN JOURNAL

One of Scotland's Earliest Great Journals

In the same year commenced the Bury Post, now the Bury & Norwich Post, Suffolf Standard & Advertiser, a series of three local weeklies.

London's great world-wide-known newspaper, The Times, dates back to 1785, and was then called the Daily Universal Register. In 1786 appeared the Doncaster, Nottingham & Lincoln Gazette, now published as the Doncaster Gazette. The Hull Packet (1787) is today represented by the Hull Daily Mail (1885) and two weekly papers—the Hull & East Yorkshire Times and the Hull and Lincolnshire Times.

The Wolverhampton Chronicle dates back to 1789 and continues to appear mid-weekly. A year later the York Herald commenced and is in the present-day group known as the Yorkshire Daily Herald. 1791 saw the founding of three still very much alive newspapers—The Observer (now Lord Astor's great Sunday newspaper), the Gazette de Guernsey (the oldest journal in the Channel Islands), and the Newark Herald, neither of which has had occasion to alter the original title.

In 1792 appeared the Bath Herald, incorporated in 1862 with the Bath Express, afterwards taking the name of the Bath Herald (daily and weekly). In the year 1794 there was started the Morning Advertiser (London), the Worcester Herald, (both of which carry on with the same name) and the Hull Advertiser, which has been a daily since 1864 as the Eastern Morning News & Hull Advertiser.

The Staffordshire Advertiser has continued to be the Staffordshire Advertiser each Saturday since 1795, and the Kelso Mail has been published weekly since the following year. In 1798 the Carlisle Journal made its first appearance and still bears the same name, having incorporated the Carlisle Express & Examiner, established in 1857. Last on the list of these old newspapers, whose successors are still vigorously carrying on, comes the Hampshire Telegraph (1799) which appears each Saturday as the Hampshire Telegraph & Post & Naval Chronicle.

The highly interesting historical record of a number of the newspapers of Great Britain is in part taken from Willing's Press Guide, to which the writer expresses his indebtedness.

well in the best possible of worlds? Surely the latter proposition is worth the serious attention of some enterprising brush manufacturer.

On broad lines, the foregoing is a brief pen-picture of the position of toilet preparations in Great Britain. There is an undoubted demand for them, but to what extent the demand is filled is a matter for investigation. There is little doubt however, that any fresh advertiser in the field would do well to thoroughly investigate the proposition from every angle, before commencing operations. Ample resources would be essential to win through to success, because big firms in strong positions would have to be met.

The small man in particular has need of special caution because he is going to find it extremely difficult to get distribution, and will not probably find the help he might reasonably expect from certain quarters. While some old time names have disappeared from sight, and are possibly unknown to the present generation, this is due to lack of enterprise rather than to lack of opportunity, as is evidenced by the newer names which figure before the public today, and there is scarcely a doubt that with a return of good trade and a consequent increase in the spending power of the people, the market for toilet preparations will show continued expansion.

The point for the newcomer to remember is not to enter into this competitive market without careful investigation, and to be absolutely certain of distribution for this market is not to be assaulted merely by weight of money, but by all the craft of salesmanship combined with well thought-out advertising

REPEAT FIRST PHONE DISPATCH

It Was Sent by Batchelder to Boston Globe in 1877

The first news dispatch ever given over a telephone to a newspaper was repeated June 5 in connection with the presentation to the Salem (Mass.) Y. M. C. A. by the New England Telephone & Telegraph Company of a replica of the first instrument made by Alexander Graham Bell.

On Feb. 12, 1877, Henry M. Batchelder, then Salem correspondent of the Boston Globe, telephoned to that paper a story of the first lecture and demonstration given by Bell in Lyceum Hall, Salem. June 5, Mr. Batchelder, now president of the Merchants' National Bank of Salem, called up the Globe again and read his earlier message at the close of the presentation exercises.

The Salem "Y" building occupies the site of the house where Bell carried on his experiments and produced his first telephone instrument. Thomas A. Watson, Bell's first assistant, and who made all the original instruments, was the principal speaker at the exercises.

Huge Population Figures

The 1921 Census of England, Scotland and Wales, shows that in the Administrative County of London and the immediately surrounding areas designated the "Outer Ring" (which together comprise what is usually known as Greater London, and coincide with the total area covered by the City of London and Metropolitan Police Districts), 7,476,168 persons were enumerated, representing about one quarter of the population of all urban areas, about one-fifth of the total population of England and Wales, and almost double that of the whole of Scotland.

You Don't Have to Disguise Yourself—

BUT YOU MUST SPEAK THEIR LANGUAGE

True, they are different—these Britishers—from us Americans; but you'll find they are jolly good fellows.

They will insist upon saying "vest" when they mean "undershirt" (but they wear them alright); "sweets" when they mean "dessert" (but they eat it just the same). And the girls powder their noses and wield the lipstick just the same as over home. You'll like 'em the same way, too.

All of them want what you want if it's good—not just because it is new, as we Americans do, mostly. That's why the advertiser in the British Market has got something worth while when he gets it.

And it's the same with the middlemen, too; they function pretty much the same way here as at home, but there are little differences that make all the difference.

And Selling in the British Market must take account of all these differences of temperament, habit, speech and nationality as compared with the American public. Don't forget, too, that the British Market includes Scotland, Wales and Ireland, where the people have different sets of differences.

So with Advertising—all its fundamental truths hold good in practice here, but it needs a different application. I have known my way about the British Market, and Advertising field, for thirty years, and have lived here for twenty of them. All that time I have been building—building, building, an Advertising Agency in London which provides that Organized Service demanded by the best American advertisers, and provided by the best American Agencies.

Derrick's is Headquarters for you in London if you want to know all about what you ought to know about the British Market.

Being a "dyed in the wool" American myself I can see your problem through American eyes, and help to solve it with thirty years of British experience and a thoroughbred British organization back of me that's trained in the most approved American-Research-Selling-Advertising methods.

Come in anyhow, and shake hands with us, even if you are not on the "still hunt" for an Advertising Agency. We are almost on Trafalgar Square, so you are sure to be near us pretty often—just come in and say "How d'y' do"!

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING

The generally recognised test of the value of a newspaper as an advertising medium is the volume of Classified Advertisements it carries.

The Daily Telegraph

CARRIES A GREATER VOLUME OF THIS CLASS OF ANNOUNCEMENT THAN ANY OTHER DAILY NEWSPAPER IN GT. BRITAIN

This alone is sufficient indication of its great pulling power

In June last, when the International Advertising Convention was won for London, the Proprietors of The Daily Telegraph invited delegates to visit their Offices. Lest there be some delegates who did not at the time make a personal note to accept this Invitation it is now repeated, and every delegate is warmly urged to take this opportunity of seeing how, whilst retaining the traditions of a Great British Newspaper, The Daily Telegraph has moved with most modern ideas in production and organisation.

J. S. HOUSES AS WELL AS BRITISH HAVE MAIL-ORDER SUCCESS IN ENGLAND

ome Experiences of An Expert That Reveal How the Press Has Been Capitalized to Sell Books, Correspondence Courses or Bayonets, and to Develop Trade Distribution

By ERIC FIELD

(Director, Erwoods Ltd., International Advertising Agency, London)

A FEW weeks ago one of the American agencies with which we are associated asked "Is it possible to run a mail rder campaign in England?"

If the doubt implied by this question s in any way general, it is high time it vas dispelled. Not only is it possible to un a mail order campaign in England, ut it is also for some propositions a very ne way to break into the market even vith an article which it is intended later n to distribute through ordinary trade hannels.

Naturally there are limitations as to he type of goods that can profitably be old by mail but they are nearly all the ame as those that apply to similar meth- ds in the States. True, geographical and ndustrial conditions here are very dif- erent. We have a population equal oughly to 40 per cent of the entire popu- ition of the United States crowded into n area no bigger than that of one of s individual States. Only a very small roportion of this population is situ- ted so deeply in the country that n hour's drive — not necessarily by ar — will not take them to a fair zed town. The people who are so situ- ted that they must shop by post are so ew as to present a negligible market t themselves. Nor even for them is here any cash on postal delivery system. or these and other persons I do not be- eve we shall ever see any counterpart f Sears Roebuck or Montgomery Ward this country.

Yet there is a great and growing busi- ess transacted through mail order ad- ertising. Although as a race we may rofess to be cynical and although it may the hardest thing in the world to find ny Englishman admitting that he ever ought anything through advertising, yet eep down in their hearts English men nd women are easily affected by adver- sing. Moreover as we happen on the hole to be in honest business, perhaps ecause we are not clever enough to be nything else, English people will send ff their money in answer to an adver- sement in the sure and certain expecta- on of getting what they send for. In ldition although we bear the reputation f being a nation of world travelers, we ove about in our own little pocket ountry much less than Americans do theirs.

The average middle class New Yorker ill take the 1,000-mile trip to Chicago uch more readily than will his counter- rt in London make the 200-mile run Manchester.

This, I imagine, is one of the reasons that explain the great volume of mail order business done by the London department stores through their advertising in the London daily papers. Every Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday the whole year round the front page of the Daily Mail is entirely occupied by advertisements of Harrods, Barker's, Selfridges, Whiteleys and the other stores and, having been advertisement manager of a great London daily myself, I know what happens if they don't get mail order results. These advertisements are mostly of dry goods departments and usually feature bargain lines. As the London dailies are distributed all over the country in the morning, the woman in the country knows she can post her order and get it filled before the line is cleared.

Nor are mail order buyers here confined to the one-time gentler sex. The instalment book business is much more interested in men than women and we have in this country several great concerns that spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in advertising every year. Of course these firms are not solely mail order. Each has a large staff of salesmen whose work represents in some cases the major portion of the turnover, but as a rule the advertising has first to justify itself by the mail orders it produces.

Of very much the same style business are correspondence courses and these flourish in this country with almost the same virulence as in America. The Pelman System of Memory Training has had a success here that far excels anything it did in the States. The I. C. S. have a fine business and a palatial building in Kingsway. Arthur Murray is now busy teaching us how to dance. The accountancy schools have done well. Dutton has carried on for years with comfortably economical small space advertising and another client of mine is building up quite a good sized business purely through the classified columns. This by no means exhausts the successful correspondence schools. Their name is legion and about the only thing we have not yet got here is any counterpart of that very interesting economy educator service of New York that deals in secondhand courses.

This story must not, however, degenerate into a catalog. Let me now give a few examples of mail-order advertising that I have either personally handled or come sufficiently close to to know the results. Firstly let us take the quaint case of the man who after the war bought from the French government its entire stock of sword bayonets. He brought them over and started selling them as sets of fire irons, joining two together to make tongs, putting a shovel on another, and so on. He sold a few through stores in the usual way and then he came to talk about advertising. We finally decided to try a three-inch single column advertisement in the Daily Mail advertising them just as they were as pokers. That advertisement cost $105 and brought him in 5,000 orders at something over 75 cents each, including postage. This is not of course by any means a record for results but it does show how at first sight a most unlikely proposition can stir even the cold-blooded English imagination.

A more useful case than this, because it has a moral of wider application, is that of a client of ours who makes a preparation for the cure of catarrh. Incidently the firm is American and the name of the article is a household word in the States. He came over here a

Those American Advertisers who are not coming to London in July, yet seek a voyage into the homes of the high social and middle class community of Great Britain, cannot do better than trim their sails in the columns of the Daily Graphic—Britain's Best Penny Morning Illustrated paper. Its editorial features are famous, commanding the reader-support of the best elements in British Society.

The advertising columns of The Daily Graphic carry only the best and cleanest advertising, and the paper has the confidence of its readers, who respond regularly to advertisers' announcements in a manner that makes the advertisers' investments profitable.

The Daily Graphic was the first illustrated daily published in London—34 years ago. Its illustrated pages are the best examples of modern illustrated journalism. In fact, The Daily Graphic commands exclusive features in its daily work and reflects in character all that is best in English journalism.

Tour A: To Edinburgh

The Edinburgh delegation of 200 will be carried on a special train from London to Edinburgh, by the courtesy of the London & North Eastern Railway Company. The party will reach Edinburgh at 7:30 on Monday evening, July 21. On Tuesday, July 22, a visit will be made to Holyrood Palace and the King's Park in motor cars. Lunch will be taken in Free-Mason's Hall, the hosts being the Edinburgh Merchant Co. and the Edinburgh Publicity Club. In the afternoon a visit is arranged to Edinburgh Castle and the Royal Mile. In the evening a reception will be given by the Lord Provost and the Town Council.

On Wednesday, July 23, those who wish will go to The Royal & Ancient Club at St. Andrews, for golf, where special matches will be arranged. Others can take advantage of a free train to Aberdeen, while the remainder will go by motor car to the old Scottish Border country and visit the Abbeys of Melrose and Dryburgh. In the evening there will be a farewell dinner or concert. On Thursday morning the delegates will leave Edinburgh for London.

A Beautiful Situation, Easy of Approach by Motor, or by Rail, Has Been Provided for the Empire Exhibit, on Whose Grounds the Associated Advertising Clubs Will Meet in July.

Tour B: To Glasgow

The Glasgow delegation will be carried on a special train from London to Glasgow, by courtesy of the London Midland & Scottish Railway Company, arriving at 6 p. m. Stop will be made at Carlisle about 3 p. m. where they will be met by a deputation of the Glasgow Publicity Club, who will proceed with them and entertain them to a special dinner at the Central Station Hotel. On Tuesday, July 22, delegates and guests will be conveyed by special train to Callander, from whence they will motor to Trossachs, returning to Callander for lunch. After lunch they will travel to Gleneagles, spend the remainder of the day there, dine at the Gleneagles Hotel and leave for Glasgow about 10 o'clock.

On July 23 they will leave Broomielaw by steamer for a sail down the Clyde to Loch Long, Kyles of Bute, round Arran, and return via Wemyss Bay to Glasgow. In the evening a Civic Reception will be arranged. On July 24 they will take a special train for Ayr, motor from Ayr to Burns' Cottage and Alloway, leave Ayr and proceed to Turnberry, lunch at hotel and return to Glasgow about 4:30. The evening will be left free for the delegates to look around the city. On July 25 the delegates will leave by special train for London, taking Dumfries en route if time permits.

BRITISH STORE ADVERTISING PROBLEMS UNKNOWN TO U. S. MERCHANTS

Great London Dailies Can Be Used to Produce Counter Sales from City and Mail Orders from Provinces at from 5 to 20 Per Cent Advertising Expense

By SIDNEY T. GARLAND

(Late Advertising Manager London Daily Mail; late Advertising Manager, Selfridge Store; late Sales Promotion, Advertising and Mail-order Manager, Kendal Milne Co., and now Principal, S. T. Garland Advertising Service, London)

FOR those delegates to the advertising convention in London who have not studied British advertising in advance many surprises are in store.

SIDNEY T. GARLAND

You will find the great London daily papers are not London dailies from the advertiser's point of view. Not half of their enormous circulations are actually in London. Even the evening press aims to circulate as widely as possible and there is probably no village or town in England and Wales into which the Daily Mail does not go.

Here, then, is a first class problem for all advertisers but particularly for the department stores. Those situated in London have no local press of any advertising value: those in provincial towns, (and there are many excellent ones outside London) if they actually possess good local newspapers, have to contend always with the advertisement columns of the great nationally distributed London dailies.

Both are in difficulties—both are compelled by such circumstances to strive one against the other for 100 per cent efficiency from their advertising appropriations.

When they advertise they must consider not only the needs or the competitive merchandise of their own locality, but everybody's needs and every retailers prices throughout the country. Our visitors, therefore, will have the unusual picture of local retailers with national competition.

This is a most excellent arrangement for the shopper but it makes department store merchandising exceptionally difficult—it makes department store advertising in Great Britain more difficult still.

The announcement for a nationally distributed and branded commodity such as a soap, medicine, tinned food, footwear or fabric are enormously helped by these conditions but it is easy to see why advertising can be more costly and always is more speculative for the department store. Normally the aim of the Department Store is to develop its counter trade.

That is its great function. Its attraction, with everything under one roof, its greatest conveniences, with the many unique services it provides—restaurant, post office, waiting room, free and speedy delivery, etc., quite naturally suggest that its main objective is to fill the store with shoppers. The dealing with post and mail order trade is, in the States, the purpose mainly of another organization. Here you have the great Department Stores doing both—its wonderful counter trade and in addition the bulk of the Letter Order Trade.

In the case of the London stores their advertising has to compete for the two kinds of business or they must consider as waste circulation all copies of newspapers sold outside the London area. The decision is not always in their hands however, for some of the greatest London Dailies have a much greater influence in the Provinces than in London and it would be necessary to rule these mediums out altogether if one were not prepared to deal extensively with orders mailed. Such action would, of course, at the same time rule out also the value of the London circulation of such newspapers which would probably reflect itself in a falling counter trade. The aim must obviously be, therefore, to obtain by organization the skill and maximum results both classes of circulation.

Local department stores, therefore, have of necessity to maintain huge organizations for the handling of mail orders, but it is often done at very great cost to themselves. Few find it possible to do this business on an advertising charge of 5 per cent and most of them find it much higher than that—I have heard of cases where 10 per cent and even 20 per cent has been spent in this direction.

And the merchandise difficulties are also immense. Consider for one moment the problems arising from the publication of a page in the Daily Mail with its daily circulation of 1,750,000.

Not all of these lines will be the instantaneous success one might expect but sufficient stock must be ready to supply all demands without delay. If there is not enough stock available there is the possibility of having to refund money to large numbers of customers and the equally disagreeable dissatisfaction bound to arise, or you have on your hands huge blocks of goods which may have to be cleared at a discount.

But supposing the whole advertising fails (and just because it costs more is no guarantee that it will not fail) then the financial loss is enough to break many businesses. Your front page in the "Daily Mail" has alone cost £1,250 (roughly $5,500) and your goods a great deal more. If you have covered the whole field and used in fair proportion all the best London Dailies you might easily have created a loss of $15,000 to $20,000 in a day! While these figures are based on the spending power of the largest emporiums it requires very little imagination to see the plight of the smaller department store under similar circumstances. They might risk less in actual cash by using fewer column inches, but one gets very little space in the best papers for $1,000, and $20,000 return from the limited amount of goods one can display in a half of three columns, though seemingly great, must be secured to bring one's advertising costs down to 5 per cent.

Unlike advertising which circulates among those people who can conveniently shop in person any day one's results if they come at all, must come immediately or the value of your announcement is largely lost in the new interest created by the announcements in the following day's paper. If your goods are right in every way, you will get results immediately, and your announcement will continue to produce returns months afterwards—if the goods are not right, results will never come!

Extraordinary care must be expended, therefore, upon the selection of merchandise for advertising purposes. Lancashire's needs are in many respects totally different from the requirements of London; the seaside towns have very little in common with the requirements of our great industrial centres—the colder Northern cities will want many things not needed in certain seasons in the Southern towns. Prejudices, hopes, aspirations are nowhere more divergent than in the counties and countries which make up Great Britain. Yet our great daily newspapers cover the whole ground.

The capitalization of this two-fold kind of business quite apart from the high cost of advertising space is no less a problem. Most of the goods advertised, if they are not specially bought lines, are bought in quantities over and above the normal counter needs.

In justice to the subject, I do not think I have given any undue emphasis to the natural handicaps with which department stores in Great Britain have to contend. That department stores are, despite these adverse conditions, successful and in many cases enormously so, is at once a tribute

Exposition of the Autumn Mode

TO-DAY Harrods opens its doors upon an Exposition of Autumn Fashion which we believe will be found worthy of the highest traditions of this House, and worthy of the discriminating public Harrods serves.

In extent, variety, and briginality, it is safe to say that there is nothing finer in this country. The master-designers of the world here contribute the most entrancing answers to that riddle of the ages, 'What Shall I Wear?'

It may be left to the quality and character of to-day's Displays to mirror the conviction of this House, that not only is there still a great public who appreciate the best, but that good taste was never more happily apparent than it is to-day.

This Message is by way of Invitation to the Exposition, which will continue all this week.

To take this, or to send a cheque from Harrods to avoid therefore attendance of this Invitation, a copy of Harrods originally illustrated Book of Autumn Fashions will be immediately forwarded on request.

"Next to Reading Matter" doesn't plague the British advertiser or publisher. Day after day, front pages like that on the left present the messages of a half-dozen or more stores. Full pages, like that shown at the right, are also popular when available.

to the skill of their salesmen in print—to the skill of their merchandising men—and to the sagacity and foresight of those merchants in whose hands the fortunes of our great enterprises rest.

It is a fact that the readers of the "Daily Mail" are the keenest of shoppers. Day by day the columns of this journal create the price standards upon which the country shops: day by day they give to Great Britain's millions of shoppers a market place the influence of which extends beyond its printed columns and serves as a basis of value for retailers throughout the country. So great is this influence that once an article appears in its columns at a price, it would be impossible to retail that article in any quantity in any part of the country at a higher rate—it is also impossible for a wholesaler or manufacturer to dispose of stocks except at a price which would permit a retailer to compete on price.

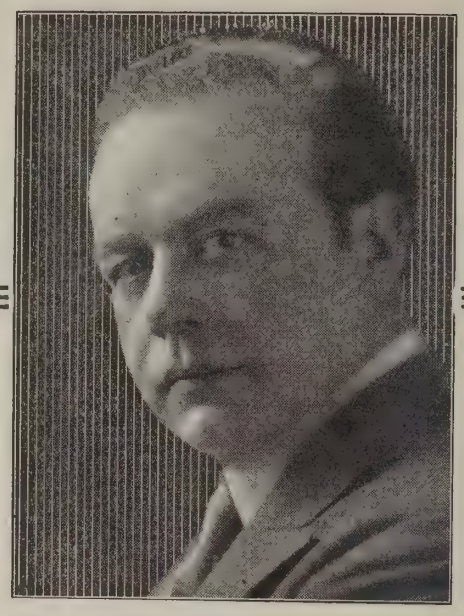
The keenness of this market and the necessity for quoting always the "rock bottom" prices making big profits impossible yet it is a productive field which hardly any department store of any size can afford to ignore. It is, indeed, a market they have built for themselves and its progressive advertising atmosphere must for all time remain a monument to the efforts mainly of the department stores.

With perhaps the exception of the advertising of one or two proprietary lines, the department stores, led by Mr. Selfridge, are responsible for the pioneer work which, during the last 15 years or so, has changed completely a notoriously conservative public's attitude toward advertising. They have by revolutionizing habit made advertising a necessity for every progressive business in Great Britain. By their intense interest and analysis they brought the net sales certificate into existence in England. There is no doubt that British advertising owes much of its eminence to the work of the department stores.

Besides the development of a difficult press department stores have introduced many good examples of auxiliary advertising, one or two of which are illustrated, and, if they are not altogether new, my readers will find them interesting, if only as examples of very successful sales promotion matter in Great Britain.

If then our visitors to the convention feel that the British department store advertising does not in every case appear as artistically presented as in their own home towns, it certainly does not mean that it is less productive of results—it may be more so!

In forming a healthy judgment the vastly different circumstances which exist here and which a few hundred words can but inadequately explain, should be borne in mind. The business of selling goods is paramount and extraneous decoration at $30 a column inch is sometimes an unwarranted extravagance detracting from the main issue.



"It Is in a Common Cause That We Meet"

SIR SYDNEY M. SKINNER

Chairman, JOHN BARKER STORE, London

AMERICAN advertising men going to Wembley for the Convention are assured of the heartiest welcome from the business men of Great Britain. And this is not only in reciprocity for the generous reception given us last year at Atlantic City. It is in a common cause that we meet, and the more the opportunity for business talks between men of the English-speaking race the happier will be our general relationship.

The public is singularly uninformed on the benefits to themselves of advertising in business; and the trader, perhaps, often underrates the power of the alliance offered him by the publicity expert. The Convention will provide a platform for authoritative pronouncements on the subject from leaders both in America and here, and in its importance it may well prove a landmark in the history of commerce and advertising.

I INVITE American Advertisers and Advertising Agents who are attending the Convention in London to make an appointment with me to discuss their Advertising Campaign in Great Britain.

A preliminary discussion places you under no obligation whatever. When shall it be?

What you want to know about British Agency Service

Knowledge of Marketing Conditions

The enterprising British service agencies can quickly put you into possession of marketing facts regarding any product. The Saward, Baker Organisation has collated much data concerning many articles of general consumption, and it has the machinery for getting rapidly complete information relating to any others. Whilst market research is a comparatively new department of agency service in this country, it has been brought to a fine point of efficiency. The compact nature of the British market has rendered this more easily possible than has been the case in the United States. The Saward, Baker Organisation has been privileged to prepare special reports for American Companies.

Advice on Distribution

But the British service agency not only knows marketing conditions and has requisite machinery for market research; it is in a position to advise upon channels of distribution and to place American manufacturers in contact with reliable selling agencies. In some instances it is in a position practically to control distribution of any particular product.

The Intangible Something

Whilst human nature is pretty well the same the world over, there are psychological differences in the buying habits of different peoples. The differences are, perhaps, intangible. They are shades of difference, but as all advertising men know, shades of difference may break or make a selling campaign. Obviously, the British service agency is in the best position to appreciate and advise, on policy, copy-appeal, the package and the media. The fact that a firm like Saward, Baker & Co., Ltd., have held some of its accounts, and held them progressively, for a quarter of a century is convincing evidence of sound judgment and virile advertising.

British Commercial Art

The best British service agencies possess their own art departments, and the present high standard of British commercial art is in great degree due to the enterprise of the agencies' own studios. The art work of Saward, Baker & Co., Ltd., has played an important part in the success of its clients.

Advertising out-of-doors

Outdoor publicity has made remarkable strides in this Country within the last fifteen years, but as you travel Great Britain you will realise that effectively to use outdoor publicity calls for much discretion and knowledge. That is why Saward, Baker's outdoor publicity department has been so carefully manned and so carefully organised.

Helping the Retailer

Practically no advertising campaign of importance is now initiated here without preliminary trade effort and subsequent dealer-helps. Those agencies who know best the marketing conditions, are strongest on the subject of trade appeal.

It is important for American Companies to know that whilst it is difficult to sell to the individual in Great Britain—Britishers are more conservative—that disadvantage is more than counter-balanced by the amazingly compact nature of the market. If, in remembering that latter fact, you will also satisfy yourselves that the British service agencies combine judgment with alertness, you will not hesitate to discuss with one or more of them the possibilities of marketing your own products here.

They will be very frank and very fair with you. The Saward, Baker Organisation gives this undertaking for itself, knowing also that it is true of British agency practice in general. A cordial invitation is extended to you to visit Saward, Baker & Co., Ltd.

BRITISH ADVERTISING HISTORY MADE IN MAIL ORDER CAMPAIGNS

Two of Britain's Largest Supply Houses Were So Founded—Catesby's Store Sells Everything, and Seed Merchant Ryder Popularizes Penny Packets of Garden Seeds

By PHILIP SMITH

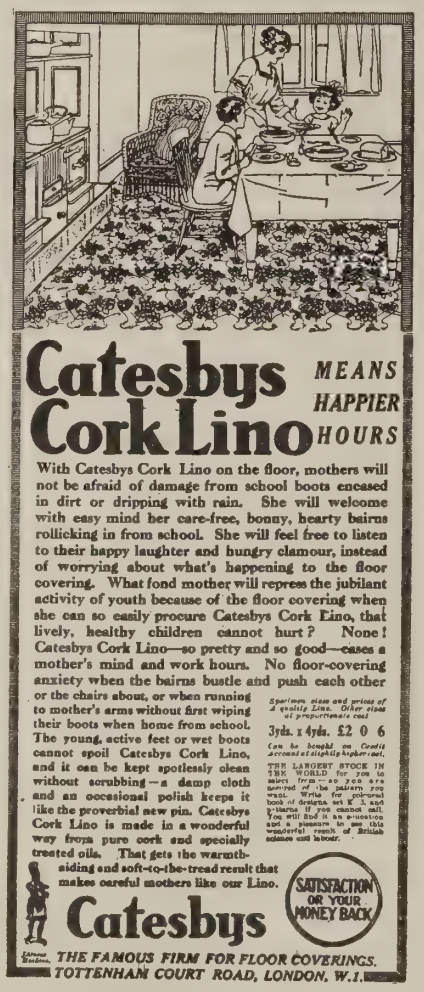
Principal Director, Smith's Advertising Agency, London

MAIL-ORDER advertising in Great Britain is very different from mail-order in the United States. Americans take their advertising more seriously. By that I mean to say, they consider advertising as a profession whose pronouncements are worthy of careful attention. They have been brought up on that belief. They take advice from advertisements.

PHILIP SMITH

You never find an Englishman taking advice from advertisements. The last thing he admits is that he is influenced by advertisements. No sir! never read 'em. You have to get at an Englishman by subconscious impression. You have to get at him when he isn't looking—mentally. Unless you can catch your fish with the one first flick of the hook, he is off.

That is why mail order advertising in this country is so dependent upon experience. You cannot reason it out. You cannot say "I have studied the mentality of the British public and I am confident that the particular way I recommend is the one straight quick way to the public pocket." You cannot say this and be reasonably sure that your prophecies will come true. There is only one sure way and that is the way that has been tried before and found correct. And to find that one way, perhaps a dozen have been tried and have failed. No one can say why the dozen failed; no one can say why the one succeeded. It just happens, like our English weather.



I recall one instance long ago when a clerk's error made one of Catesby's advertisements appear with the wrong block fitted to the wrong copy. The result was chaos, but that advertisement almost made a record in replies. I do not say this is a good principle to act upon in mail order advertising, but it illustrates my contention—you never can tell—in this country—you never can tell unless you know. The assistance of an old hand at the game is not only valuable, it is absolutely essential.

One other point to remember is that in Great Britain you are dealing with a certain class—not a certain class "socially" but a certain class "intellectually"; though for the most part the class does, I think, coincide with that generally known as "lower middle." There are thousands upon thousands in this country who would never dream of buying through the mail, even if you pelted them with full pages for a twelvemonth. You must know exactly where your potential customers lie and exactly how to reach them—economically.

Very important is this last word "economically." In mail order advertising every penny has to bring its pound. The margin of gross profit in the intensely competitive condition of today, is usually just enough for an advertising expenditure barely sufficient to bring in the results if properly used. Any sort of experimenting must be fatal. There simply isn't space for it. Not only must the mail order advertiser have a very, very shrewd knowledge of what media are most likely to bring him orders, he must also know what size of space is likely to furnish the largest ratio of orders in proportion to the cost.

If he does not know these things as result of his past experience I advise him to go to an advertising agent who does. And this I recommend all business men from the States to do. However large their knowledge of their own country may be, it will avail very little in this.

So far I have dwelt on the less attractive aspects of mail order advertising in Great Britain. I have dwelt on them because I have seen so many promising ventures go under simply and solely through mismanagement. And every year that passes, as I have said, makes the chances of mishandling greater and the penalty more severe. But on the other side of the balance you can put this cheerful thought: that when you do get on the right side of the British public, you will find them not only generously responsive but unshakably loyal. Your success will not only be great—it will be permanent.

Happy style in advertising success.

Take Catesbys for instance. Catesbys mail order success (which made advertising history in this country) was due to two strokes of genius—one serious, the other frivolous. The serious one was the system of payments by easy instalments. I am not sure whether Catesbys actually invented this system. I am sure that they were the first to put it boldly before the public and to announce a fixed schedule of terms.

Here you have the foundation of mail order success; something good and new to offer to the public. For it must not be forgotten that the goods they offered in easy payments were worth paying for. However clever their method of getting their cork linoleum on to the floors of people's houses it would not have carried them over a year of business had not that cork linoleum stood years and years of wear.

In mail order business, no less than any other form of trading, must the quality of your goods be up to standard, or beyond it. This then was the basis on which Catesbys started to work.

The way in which they presented their effers to the public was the second stroke of genius, which I have called frivolous. They cloaked their advertisements in a simple sort of humor, a sort of amiable nonsense which every one could understand and which came to be known as Catesby's "drolleries." I have been told that the association of nonsense with advertising is dangerous. Well, it may be, but it wasn't dangerous for Catesbys.

When we first became associated with them they were occupying a small single-windowed shop in Tottenham Court Road. Now on an extension of the same site they have premises which constitute one of the six great London stores.

Perhaps a little lapse from modesty may be allowed even to an advertising man, who is expected to devote all his energies in that direction to his clients. But I am really and genuinely proud of my association with Catesbys and what has been perhaps the greatest and most satisfactory mail order success of its time. No amount of theoretical science could have foretold the issue, neither can it explain it. It was simply a venture that succeeded; and it has taught those who, like myself, were privileged to take part in it more about mail order advertising than all the theory that was ever written.

Turn now to Ryders, the famous seed merchants. They also had a sound proposition to present to the public. There were tens and tens of thousands of householders in the big towns throughout the country with small gardens tacked on to their houses which they were not sure what to do with.

Ryders offered them a simple way of turning these gardens into little paradises of summer flowers, or into miniature market gardens, by the simple expedient of penny packets of seeds through the post. It was a service that was needed—its success depended only on the method of making it known. I have placed full pages for Ryders costing $6,000 a page, which have paid for themselves over and over again in orders for penny packets of garden seeds. Think of what that means in individual responses to one advertisement! That shows the possibilities of mail order advertising in this country.

Robeys of Birmingham again had a more difficult proposition. They went straight into the cheap gramophone market. They tried to sell gramophones through the post. We have been advertising for them for 14 years and I suppose I am right in saying that their sales have gone into tens of thousands. I think I am also correct in saying that their advertising space has rarely exceeded four inches single column. Certainly this is the average. I am not one of those who believe that in advertising, results are scientifically proportionate to the size of space. I know that a moderate sized space provided it is used in the right way can produce satisfactory results.

But over my shoulder I seem to hear the remark, "Ah, yes, but in the past mail order advertising was a very different thing from what it is today. Circumstances have changed. Money is scarce. The costs of running a scheme are greater; advertising costs are greater. And what is more, a large part of that section of the public which was a fertile field for the mail order advertiser has changed its habits. Its standard of comfort has risen and the scope of the big stores has been enlarged to cater for it. . . . Circumstances have changed."

Have they? I know my own clients—and a man can only speak from his own experience—are doing as well as, or better than, they were doing before the war.

The mail order advertiser in this country requires no greater courage today than 20 years ago—and his chances of success are just as good.

A letter to our American Friends

ADDISON HOUSE,
26 Bedford Street,
W. C. 2.

Gentlemen:

The purpose of this communication, other than to send you greetings, is to introduce the quality of the allied service offered by the Westminster Advertising Service, Ltd., and May's Advertising Agency, Ltd.

The organization we place at your disposal is built upon lines that assure efficiency. The keystone of our policy is personal service.

Should you place your advertising with us, your requirements having been studied, the account would be taken in charge of personally by one of the four principals: viz., The Rt. Hon. G. H. Roberts, P. C., Edgcumbe Brighten, Kenneth Blundell, or Ralph Newton May.

At frequent intervals the principals, together with the expert members of their staff, confer on all accounts handled from this address. Thus your needs are under constant review, and the knowledge, experience, and ideas of each are pooled for your advantage. Scientific advertising is not a matter of routine. It calls for close study, continuous attention, and the invigorating infusion of fresh and original ideas.

To give our clients the service to which they are entitled, we have co-ordinated every necessary phase of advertising. We are equipped to undertake newspaper and periodical advertising, outdoor publicity schemes and printing. Research merchandising plans and sales consultations, the preparation of "copy" and advice on art policies are included in our service.

An advertising agency fails unless it is inspired by the pride of achievement, resulting from the ever-growing prosperity of the clients for whom it acts. We measure our own success by that of those many satisfied clients who entrust their business to us.

Give us the opportunity of discussing this matter with you. One of our principals will call upon you at your convenience, when our advice will be freely placed at your disposal.

Yours faithfully,

Geo. H. Roberts
Chairman.

WOMEN IN BRITISH ADVERTISING

By ANNE MEERLOO

(Managing Director, Meerloo Publicity Service, London)

ONE of the businesses which is least regarded as woman's sphere in Great Britain is the business of advertising; possibly because it is, comparatively speaking, a new profession, or is regarded with more seriousness today than it has ever been before. If, ten years ago, a woman had set up for herself in advertising and had endeavored to persuade firms of any standing to place their appropriations with her, or to consult her, she would have received no encouragement, and would probably have been confronted everywhere by the attitude which is expressed by the time-worn remark that "woman's place is in the home, minding the babies." At the best she would have been merely tolerated.

Now in these more enlightened times, the woman has taken her place in business on equal terms with the man, has fully justified her existence, and, as a rule, receives the same consideration and attention that is accorded to her so-called "mental superiors."

Advertising is one of those professions which have been in the past, particularly conservative in such matters. It is only within the last four or five years that women have gained any footing on this field, Today women occupy a number of important administrative positions in advertising, and I think the number will increase.

Advertising is intended to appeal to so many different types of people—its scope is so varied, and the psychological side of life plays so important a part, that the particular sense which is exceptionally well developed in woman—that instinctive gift of judgment—some would call it intuition—is very valuable.

In England, among the women holding important posts and controlling large advertising interests, is the Advertising Manager of one of the oldest and most important weekly journals in the country. A big firm of printers also has a woman at its head, and a woman runs the advertising department of one of our big motor-car manufacturers. Another indication of the fact that women are entering into the advertising world is that there are now in existence several clubs composed solely of advertising women, and that a representative number have been appointed to sit on the International Advertising Convention at the Wembley Exhibition. I think that is proof (and a "bouquet" at the same time) that they have a voice in the "selling organization" of this country, just in the same way that they have a voice in the affairs of the state.

As we all know, women were regarded as incapable of doing anything except looking after the home, and one can appreciate the disadvantages to which advertising women were subjected in the eyes of the masculine world.

First of all, in an advertising agency, there is a study of manufacturing methods of the article to be placed on the market. There is to be considered the law of supply and demand, the selection of their suitable market, their greatest attraction over competition, selling price, packing and so on, before the work of the actual advertising of that article can be commenced.

Then there is the financial aspect of an advertising agency. It is not an uncommon thing for an advertising agent to have as much as £30,000 outstanding on his books at the end of a single month's trading. Now whoever heard of a woman who would risk her capital in that way, when she could buy jewels and motor-cars and other necessities of life!

Again, there is a mass of detail work to look after, such as fierce bargaining with newspapers for good positions next to "live" news matter. There are ideas to produce, drawings to be made, blocks for printing, the illustrations, and then a kind of literary jugglery in the shape of making each word in the advertisement worth 5/— or a £ in order to bring orders for the goods. But who could be better fitted to do this work than a woman? For is it not the women who actually influence advertising, because practically every advertisement that is written is written to appeal to the women? Whether directly or indirectly everything that is sold is purchased, or the purchase is influenced, by a woman.

Think of the things one buys for one's own use, whether luxuries or necessities. Take soap for instance. How many go into a chemist's shop and say, "I want a tablet of soap, please"? You say, "Let me have a tablet of Vinolia, or Palmolive or Erasmic soap"—whatever you have tried before or have heard or read about. We try out an article we have heard about and if we like it we continue to use it.

It isn't enough to advertise an article largely, in the hope that it is going to have a prosperous and steady sale. You must have a good article, because you might deceive women into buying once and, if it isn't good, the advertisements can say what they like, we shan't go on using it.

There is no question that the advertisements in England are truer, more genuine and more faithful to facts than the advertisements in any other country in the world.

Manufacturers in this country are scrupulously careful or, at least, those I have had dealings with—that no words should be written in connection with their goods which they cannot substantiate. I am not altogether sure that this is entirely due to the integrity and honesty of the manufacturer, but I think it is the fact that when they are advertising to the women of this country, they will be very readily "found out" if they embroider their story extravagantly; so I might claim that women, therefore, influence in this way better advertising and a higher standard of business morality.

I hope I am not painting too vivid a halo around our heads when I make this somewhat sweeping statement, or, in any way casting aspersions on the business morality of the sterner sex. Nevertheless I think we can claim this for ourselves. There is no doubt that the women of this country are the absolute dictators of advertising. Very largely all the millions of pounds which are spent annually in advertising are directed to appeal to women. Consider such things as clothes, hats, shoes, toilet articles, sweetmeats, domestic articles, baby foods and motor-cars—even commercial vehicles and industrial implements. Here again, woman's influence is behind most of the purchases, if one goes deep down to the root of the matter. Even steamships and railway companies have their appeal to the woman, because, even if she does not actually make the journey herself, she influences her menfolk to do so.

In the avoidance of such untoward happenings woman's instinct of carefulness in business is often used to advantage. And that is one reason why the sphere of woman is widening every day in Britain—a country in which women have an opportunity of entering that sphere to which they are best and most aptly fitted.

Birthday Greetings

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—Congratulations on your twelfth anniversary!

Congratulations on your service idea!

Congratulations on the manner in which you have developed EDITOR & PUBLISHER!

Here's hoping that you may have many, many more 12-year periods that are as full of accomplishments and developments as the past.

LONDON IS THE WORLD'S CITY OF CITIES

LONDON is a city of cities, a repository of wealth, culture, historic interests and the lodestone of British Imperial enterprise.

As the center of the British Empire it naturally carries within its borders the headquarters of the greatest financial, commercial and artistic interests of that Empire, and no business enterprise in any quarter of the globe can be said to have attained success in these days without adequate representation in the City of London.

Perhaps to Americans the most convincing feature about London's commercial importance is the fact that so many American houses—financiers, manufacturers, and producers—are centered upon that city as a point for the exercise of their European or British developments.

The City of London proper is but an area of 678 acres with a taxable assessment of £5,808,818 (1920), and a population of 13,706; the Administrative County of London (excluding the City) covers an area of 74,172 acres with a taxable value of £39,788,071 and a population of 4,469,453.

The richest of the London areas is that of Westminster, created the City of Westminster by the Royal Charter in 1900. It includes within its borders some of the finest buildings in London, among them the Houses of Parliament, Westminster Abbey, the Westminster (Roman Catholic) Cathedral, the Law Courts, Buckingham Palace, St. James' Palace, and the principal Government buildings—the Admiralty, War Office, Treasury, Home, Foreign and India Officers, etc. It also includes the fashionable residential districts of Mayfair and Belgravia.

London has no skyscrapers, its buildings being rarely higher than ten floors. But what the architecture lacks in height it possesses in beauty and dignity, many fine buildings, of historic interest in particular, being dotted throughout the City and West-end.

A fine avenue, broad and spacious, is the Victoria Embankment, running along the River Thames from Blackfriars to Westminster, from which a fine vista of the river, with such buildings as St. Paul's Cathedral, the Houses of Parliament and the County Hall (the new seat of the London County Council), standing out against the skyline. The residential thoroughfares of highest rentals and estate values are Park Lane (running on the east side of Hyde Park) and Berkeley Square.

The parks and open spaces of London are popular places of resort, the larger parks of the Administrative County covering a total of some 1,672 acres. Regents Park is the largest of them all (472 acres) and houses the Zoological Gardens and the Botanic Gardens. But Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens (separated only by a railed fence) cover a larger area (630 acres) and are the fashionable parades of society—the Hyde Park "church parade" and Rotten Row being the Sunday rendezvous of many smart London folk. St. James's Park is small but has a semi-official character, running as it does between Whitehall with its Government buildings, and Buckingham Palace. The Green Park is another small park adjoining St. James's Park, and these four parks are so placed that it is possible to walk across London from Westminster, through St. James's and Green Parks, cross the thoroughfare of Piccadilly, and through Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens either to High street Kensington or Notting Hill gate—a leafy stroll of some four miles. There are numerous other parks, Battersea Park (200 acres), in South London, Victoria Park (217 acres) in North London, Finsbury Park (115 acres) and 142 further open spaces.

About the Hulton Group

The re-organization of the Hulton Group of newspapers has in no way affected their usefulness, singlely or collectively, to American advertisers who desire to establish their products in the British Market.

ALTHOUGH under three separate directorates, there is still a friendly working arrangement (as this advertisement demonstrates) to the benefit of present or potential advertisers. The papers are re-grouped so that each is peer of its own particular realm.

For example, the DAILY SKETCH and the ILLUSTRATED SUNDAY HERALD is the strongest combination of picture papers, having an exceptional feminine appeal and great home influence, outstanding in their sale-creating force for every kind of commodity from toilet products to wireless equipment.

THE EVENING STANDARD is London's greatest evening journal. It circulates in London, Greater London and for fifty miles around, enjoying the support of the well-to-do readers of London's Eight Morning Papers.

The DAILY DISPATCH, EVENING CHRONICLE combine to cover that wealthy industrial zone represented by Lancashire, West Yorkshire, The Potteries, Cheshire and North Wales.

The SUNDAY CHRONICLE is the choice of the good middle class public and an essential item of every National campaign. The EMPIRE NEWS is the premier mail-order medium with a National circulation. These journals together with the WORLD'S PICTORIAL NEWS, ATHLETIC NEWS, SPORTING CHRONICLE, IDEAS and the several weekly publications, combine to give the American advertiser a group of publications sufficient for an effective campaign in Great Britain.

Nottingham, situated in the very centre of England, possesses insurpassed railway and waterway communication, coal supplies on her doorsteps, and many important industries: Lace, Hosiery, Drugs, Tobacco, Engineering, Coal Mining, Printing, Brickmaking, Brewing, and Malting.

The "Nottingham Journal," with a certified net sale of over 42,000 copies daily, guarantees by far the largest circulation of any morning paper in this area. Together with its associated evening paper—the "Evening News"—it thoroughly covers the North and East Midlands.

LO ADVE HEADQ

Westminster Gazette.

"The Westminster Gazette" contains all the news from all the world daily, and occupies a position of unrivalled influence. Is well informed, authoritative, reliable. Famous for its early and exclusive information, the leading features include special articles by the most brilliant writers, Parliamentary and Political reports; City, financial, and industrial news; art, music, and dramatic criticisms; book reviews, sports and pastimes, Ladies' page, serial story, news-pictures, etc. It is the best and most complete Morning Newspaper of the day.

YORK.

The "Yorkshire Gazette," in addition to being the only weekly paper for the City of York and surrounding district, is published in separate editions respectively for the Thirsk, Malton and Ryedale Valley area, one of the most important agricultural districts in Yorkshire, and also for the Cleveland and Whitby Division of the North Riding of England's greatest County. The "York hire Gazette" is one of the oldest weekly papers in the country and in addition to selling very largely in York City and the immediate district, with its industrial, engineering and confectionery connections, has a really excellent sale amongst agriculturists.

DURHAM.

Durham County, with a population of 1½ million people, is the third most thickly populated county in the Kingdom, and its coal fields are world famed. Railways were first laid down in this area, and the county has a reputation of long standing as a rich agricultural area. Engineering and iron working are ever large wage-producing industries in this busy part of North East England.

WEST STANLEY.

The "Stanley News and Consett Chronicle" is easily the dominant weekly paper for the whole of North-West Durham, one of Durham County's most important mining areas. There are at least 20 important coal mines in the district, each with a large number of employees, making up big industrial thickly-populated areas.

The "North West Durham Observer" and more recently the "Consett Chronicle," have been incorporated with the paper, which has increased its sales and influence in a truly remarkable manner during the past six years.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.

The "Auckland and County Chronicle," one of the oldest weeklies in the palatine, has a great sale in the county, and is published in three editions. The principal weekly paper for Durham County, and its sale and influence are far-reaching, covering as it does the other important centres of industry, Shildon, Crook, etc., as well as the agricultural areas of Weardale and Swaledale.

To the keen discerning advertiser "The Westminster Gazette" offers a medium of first-class business-producing value. Its readers comprise the purchasing classes, the very people who buy the bulk of the nation's high-grade goods. It goes directly into the home, and reaches the woman who buys for the household. Other advertisers have proved this by experience, and its columns carry the announcements of successful firms throughout the country.

SHEFFIELD.

Newspaper House, Fargate, Sheffield.

Sheffield is the metropolis of a wonderful industrial area which includes South Yorkshire, North-East Derbyshire, and a goodly portion of Lincolnshire and Nottingham. The other important centres are Rotherham, Mexborough, Barnsley, Doncaster, Chesterfield, etc. This area is the home of world-renowned firms, Vickers, Cammell Lairds, Thos. Firths, John Browns, Edgar Allens, etc., etc.

It is this area on which the "Sheffield Independent" and its evening associate concentrate.

The "Sheffield Independent" has the largest certified net sale of any morning paper printed and published in Yorkshire.

DARLINGTON.

Newspaper House, Priestgate, Darlington.

The North-East Coast area is the principal iron and steel producing district in the country: the coal fields of Durham and Northumberland are world-famed, whilst the shipbuilding output from the Tyne, Wear and Tees construction yards is amongst the greatest in the world.

In this wonderful industrial area—the birthplace of railways—the "Northern Echo" dominates sales.

HEREFORD.

Advertisers making an appeal in Herefordshire and the Wye Valley have undoubtedly unlimited opportunities with whatever products they have for disposal

Hereford, with its population of 23,000, is directly connected with the following thickly populated Counties: Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, Monmouthshire, Shropshire, Breconshire, and Radnorshire, which are all famous for their agricultural enterprise.

Two of the oldest newspapers in the country are the "Hereford Journal" and the "Hereford Mercury," which are read with widespread interest throughout the whole of this district.

LINCOLN.

The "Lincolnshire Chronicle" ranks among the Weeklies as one of the most valuable mediums in the country. It has by far the largest circulation of any newspaper printed in the city of Lincoln, and for nearly a century has been the favourite paper of farmers and cottagers in practically every village in the county. thus while it is the sole means of publicity in the more isolated villages, it is also the principal medium for trading or official notices in the important industrial and county town of Lincoln and half-a-score of busy market towns, such as Grantham, Sleaford, Horncastle, Gainsborough, etc.

SWINDON.

"The Swindon Advertiser" (weekly) has a house-to-house circulation; the "Evening Advertiser" is the only daily paper printed between London and Bath.

Swindon, the headquarters of the Great Western Railway and the hub of the industrial portion of Wiltshire, numbers in or within a few miles of its borders half of the total population of the county. Since the war its proportion of unemployed to population has been lower than any other centre of industry in the country, and the railway work on hand and on order ensures a steady increase of employment for several years.

LANCASTER.

"The Lancaster Guardian" and "The Morecambe Guardian" are the largest newspapers for the area, never being less than twelve full size pages each. "The Lancaster Guardian" (now in its eighty-eighth year) enters nearly every house in the borough (40,000 inhabitants) and in addition has an extensive circulation for twenty miles around. It is pre-eminently a "family paper." "The Morecambe Guardian," a thriving "four-year-old," is the only week end paper in Morecambe and and Heysham, and already enjoys in that district a substantial circulation as a home journal

PROMISE OF 1923 THE REALIZATION OF 1924

LEVIATHAN

(From Editor & Publisher, May 19, 1923)

Resolved

That this Club invites the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World to hold its Convention in 1924 in London, and appoints a Committee to organize an Invitation Committee consisting of every interest in this matter.

The Thirty Club of London once made a Good Resolution. It was conceived by Mr. W. S. Crawford and put to the Club during his year of office as President in 1922. It is bringing the new Pilgrim Fathers to Atlantic City.

LANCASTRIA

Queens of America's merchant marine share with the Britain's mercantile navy the honor of bearing the delegates to London from the Western World. "George Washington" and "Leviathan" were names familiar to Americans and their Allies during 1918 and the days after the Armistice—as familiar as Pear's Soap or Armour's Ham. They were transports then with their chiefest glories the number of troops they could pack 'tween decks and the celerity with which they could debark their contingents at Brest and turn around for another trip to New York through mines and torpedoes. With equal, nay greater, facility, they have turned to their new mission—that of bearing ambassadors whose thoughts are concentrated on keeping the world in amity, that the currents of world trade on which the happiness of nations depend be not interrupted.

⚓ ⚓ ⚓ ⚓

Commissioned in 1907 as part of the great German fleet of pre-war days, the "Republic" now flies the flag of the U. S. Lines. With a tonnage of 18,072 and horsepower of 12,000, this ship which will carry the majority of the American delegates, is equipped to give them commodious accommodations and a comfortably fast journey.

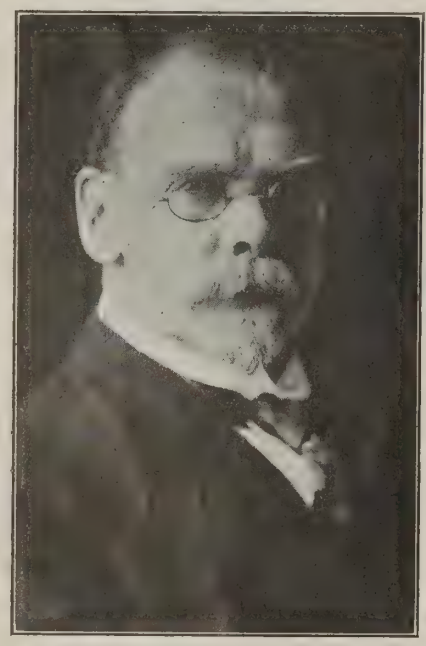
One of the new Cunard steamers is the "Lancastria," a cabin ship of 16,000 tons, placed in commission this year. She was one of the two liners originally selected by the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World to carry the American contingent.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Without precedent is the overseas excursion of more than 2,000 Americans to attend a business convention—advertising, as usual, leading the column of world trade.

REPUBLIC

LONDON—A SPECIFIC MARKET



By SAMSON CLARK

(Chairman, Samson Clark Advtg. Service, London)

IT CANNOT be too often or too emphatically impressed upon American advertising directors and sales managers that the British markets differ in two or three essential respects from their own markets.

The main difference lies in the fact that our own population of rather more than 40,000,000 is enclosed within a comparatively small area, thus rendering it easy to get at. There is hardly a point that cannot be reached within 24 hours, and the richest and best is easily within a 12-hour journey.

One result of this is that London is the natural centre of advertising as well as of distribution. It is safe to say that quite 80 per cent of national advertising is spent in London, possibly more.

Another result is that the great national and weekly newspapers have been able to build up enormous circulations thus for example, the News of the World, a Sunday paper, has a circulation of 3,000,000; the Daily Mail reaches nearly 2,000,000, being closely followed by the Daily Express, Daily Chronicle, and Daily News, each with a circulation approximating 1,000,000.

There are, of course, several large and important provincial newspapers that have to be taken into account when any national campaign is under consideration, but to cover London the big national newspapers have to be used, even though a great proportion of their circulation is throughout the provinces, say within a couple of hundred miles.

Although London, by reason of its density, affords a good market, this very advantage also involves one or two other points of difference from American conditions. For example, as we are still primarily a free trade country, London is the greatest free market-place of the world, and severe competition brings prices down to the lowest level, so that on any ordinary commodity it will be safe to reckon upon there already being rivals in the field.

Then again we have not anything like the same number of big general stores, either in London, or in our other big towns, such as are the rule in the United States. Trade is still done very largely through shopkeepers dealing in their own particular classes of goods; thus the grocer stocks only grocery goods; the hardware man will handle ironmongery almost exclusively; the men's outfitter is restricted to men's wear; most drapery houses deal with nothing but drapery goods, and so on.

Owing to the ease with which stocks can be obtained and replenished it is not the general custom on this side to buy in large quantities. The retailer expects the wholesaler to keep sufficient stocks to be ready on short notice to furnish supplies. The old days when a draper, for example, would arrange his season's orders at the beginning of the spring and autumn are to a large extent past. He buys, as a rule, from hand to mouth, as and when his stocks need replenishment. This is particularly so in the London area. Probably, of course, it applies to your own big towns, such as New York, Chicago, etc., but there may be many provincial manufacturing houses in America who would not readily realize the fact. Car-load deliveries of any commodity at one time are almost unknown on this side. They would only apply to a few of the very big houses, and then at prices cut sufficiently to make the lot tempting.

It is an axiom in the advertising field that the Londoner is the most difficult man, or woman, to secure through advertising. In the world of fashion, of course, the daily announcements of our big stores are watched with increasing interest by women, but in all other fields the populace is so well catered for in the dozens of shopping streets, that it takes a fair amount of advertising, plus a lot of personal work by travelers, demonstrations, etc., to get a proposition past the naturally conservative temperament of the Londoner.

London is unquestionably a big and rich market, but it has a peculiar temperament, just as I imagine your own towns have, but, in one particular, I should think we are notably different, that is to say—our people are slow to pick up new ideas and, as almost necessarily follows, slow to drop old ones, and unless due attention be paid to these idiosyncrasies a lot of unnecessary trouble will have to be endured by the man who determines to maket his goods here.

Just as no English agency would think of endeavoring to cover the American field without using the services of Americans on the spot, so I would strongly recommend our American friends to employ reputable and reliable English houses of this side, at least in the early stages of any proposed campaign, and most important of all, if possible, the ground should be viewed personally by the American sales manager before any attempt is made. The journey may be fairly costly but the cost would probably be quickly saved in the experience gained in handling any conceivable proposition. The present season is, without question, an excellent opportunity for such a visit and consideration of possibilities, as we can at the present time offer the advantages of the Empire Exhibition, which is far and away the biggest thing of its kind ever attempted in any part of the world.

This may strike some readers as a bold claim to make but I feel quite safe in making it, and, at the same time, urging that any merchant or manufacturer who contemplates establishing himself in the British market should do his utmost to come here and look round first in order that he may arrange his plan according to our conditions and requirements.

LIVERPOOL—THE WESTERN GATEWAY

LIVERPOOL'S rapid development is akin to that of many cities of the Western world. Two hundred years ago, Liverpool was a small town of under 6,000 people, mainly fishing folk. Today, as revealed by the census of 1921, the population of Liverpool is 803,118, and with the adjoining boroughs of Bootle, Birkenhead, and Wallasey, which with Liverpool form one commercial community, the population is 1,115,939. The possibilities today are well-nigh, illimitable; the prospects are brighter, and the chances are that in the years to come the city will attain to an even more splendid position than it now has owing to the indomitable pluck and steadfast loyalty of its citizens.

Liverpool owes its importance and rapid growth in population and wealth to its favorable geographical position and its magnificent harbor. It is the natural gateway of the West. Through its portals passes one-third of the total imports of Great Britain, and its exports far exceed those of any other port in the country, including London. Its huge export trade is due to its nearness to the teeming industrial regions of Lancashire, the West Riding of Yorkshire, Staffordshire, and the Midlands.

The Liverpool docks extend along the river for six and a half miles, and possess 27 miles of quays and a water area of 430 acres. On the opposite side of the river are Birkenhead docks—transferred to the Mersey Docks and Harbor Board in 1857, the year of its inception—with ten miles of quays and a water area of 172 acres. In 1800 about 5,000 ships entered the port; today the total is in the region of 25,000. The first commercial wet dock constructed in England was at Liverpool, when the Pool from which Liverpool derives its name was converted, in 1715.

With the opening of the 19th century, rapid development came with the adoption of steam to manufactures and transport, and the exploitation of the rich coal and iron deposits of Lancashire and the neighboring counties.

Two notable events stand out in this epoch. The first was the arrival at Liverpool, on June 20, 1819, after a 26-days' voyage, of the Savannah, the first steam-driven ship to cross the Atlantic.

Of equal significance was the opening, on September 15, 1830, of the first British railway—between Liverpool and Manchester. A train of 32 carriages, holding 732 passengers, and drawn by seven engines, left the first passenger railway station, which stood in Crown street, Liverpool, and duly arrived in Manchester, notwithstanding prognostications to the contrary by many who stoutly opposed the introduction of railways. In 1832 the line was extended, and four years later the famous Lime street terminus was opened. The year 1837 saw trains running from Liverpool to Birmingham, and 1838 brought London into railway touch with Liverpool.

In 1846 the London & North Western Railway was formed, and today Liverpool possesses a great network of railways facilitating the distribution of the huge volume of imports which enter the port, and bringing for shipment the still greater volume of exports manufactured in the adjoining industrial centres.

A riverside station was opened in 1895 for the convenience of Atlantic passengers, who previously had to cross the city by road to reach the various railway termini. During the war this riverside station proved invaluable in connection with the transport of troops. No fewer that 1,729,000 troops, in 3,706 trains, passed through Liverpool during the period of hostilities, and of this army the greater number entrained at Riverside Station, though the fact was known to only a small portion of the citizens of Liverpool.

The Landing Stage, another vastly convenient provision, has a length of nearly half a mile. It is a floating structure carried on iron pontoons. For transatlantic and other vessels movable gangways are used, and high level bridges have been provided for use in connection with the mammoth ocean liners. To accommodate these liners, splendidly equipped docks have been provided, and further extensions are now proceeding at the northern end. Some idea of the importance of the improvements now in hand may be gathered from the fact that the total cost is estimated at about £7,500,000. When completed, 55 acres will be added to the dock area of the port, and there will be nearly three miles of additional quayage.

It is as a distributing centre that Liverpool is pre-eminent, and in its enormous warehouses are to be found the products of every country in the world. The city is the home of shipowners, merchants, bankers, brokers, underwriters, buyers and agents, and ship store dealers. Of all the vast imports of Liverpool none approaches cotton in value, and after being spun and woven, the bulk of the manufactured goods from the looms of Lancashire are exported and again pass through Liverpool. It is also the port for the woolen manufactures of the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The provision trade, in point of value, ranks high in the imports of the port, and trade has been greatly helped by the cold storage accommodation. The cold stores of Liverpool present unrivalled facilities for the handling of all kinds of frozen and chilled produce, and consist of 8,000,000 cubic feet of space. So far as ice-making is concerned, machinery is laid down in Liverpool capable of supplying more than double the present demand. Nearly every country in the world supplies Liverpool with canned goods. The green fruit trade, too, is of enormous extent and the Liverpol fruit auctions attract buyers from all the big centres.

It would be a mistake to suppose that Liverpool deals with only the manufactures of other centres; it is a hive of industry and enterprise on its own account. For a century the shipbuilders on the Cheshire side of the Mersey have been, and they still are, able to cope with every forward movement in the shipbuilding and engineering industry. As regards ship-repairing, the Mersey stands pre-eminent in the Kingdom, and this is a great advantage to shipowners in that it is possible for them to have executed any kind of repair at short notice.

The milling industry has grown enormously within the last twenty-five years, and Liverpool has become the second largest milling centre in the world, running Minneapolis very close in point of importance. Allied to this industry are biscuit-making and the manufacture of cakes and confectionery, which have made rapid strides in Liverpool within recent years. The manufacture of compound cakes and meals, specially prepared for cattle fattening, milk producing, pig feeding, or for sheep, is a development of the seed, oil and cake trade, and represents a tonnage of over 400,000 tons per annum.

Another important industry in Liverpool is that of sugar refining. The industry dates back to 1667, but when the Continent started to make sugar from beets about 1855, the industry was menaced. Many British refineries then went to the wall, but Liverpool firms met the new situation with characteristic boldness, and it is computed that one Liverpool firm, also operating in London, now produces more than one-third of all the sugar refined in the whole country.

The manufacture of heavy chemicals and soap-making are two important industries in the district, and the influence of Liverpool extends over an area in which is perhaps a larger variety of crafts and trades than in any other of equal size. Among the smaller industries are sheet metal works, tobacco works, sawmills, furniture factories, bobbin mills, dye works, breweries, cooperages, and printing and bookbinding establishments, also the making of paints, matches, sails, printing inks, preserves, sweets, ropes, fine chemicals, waste-detecting and integrating meters, wire cables, etc.

Liverpool is a city of fine, stately buildings. The finest structure is undoubtedly the spacious and noble St. George's Hall, which, with its concomitant suite of the County Sessions House, the Walker Art Gallery, the Picton Reading Room and Library, the Museum, and the Central Technical Schools,

On to London!

The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World are cordially invited to hold their 1924 Convention in London, England.

Lever Brothers Company, Cambridge, Mass., have heard with the greatest interest of the proposal that the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World should hold their 1924 Convention in London, England.

They hope that the proposal will become a fact, thereby providing yet another link between the two great English-speaking nations of the world.

Should this Convention be held in London, Lever Brothers Company desire to issue a very cordial invitation to all the members to visit the far-famed village and works at Port Sunlight, Cheshire—the English headquarters of their company.

They know full well that the members will be received at Port Sunlight with a hearty welcome, and will find preparations made there to ensure that every moment of their visit is full of interest.

BRADFORD

THE WOOL CENTRE OF THE WORLD

AN AMERICAN'S IMPRESSIONS.

When Mr. Claude Meeker was appointed U.S. Consul to Bradford, he was told by the State Department in Washington that Bradford was one of the most important Consulates under the United States Government.

It did not take him long to find that Bradford was the wool and woollen centre of the world. "There the wools of the universe seem to be gathered together," he wrote, "and it gathers the fleeces of the tropics as well as the coarser fibres of the North Countries. From North and South America, Mexico, and Australia, the countries of Europe and Asia, and even the Isles of the Sea, go to Bradford wools of every length and of every colour and description. . . The people of Bradford and vicinity wash it, comb it, sort it, card it, dye it, spin it and weave it into cloth, ship to the outposts of the world, and still not satisfied, they buy it back as rags from the junk shops and ash barrels of the universe, rend it into shoddy, and send it forth once again to clothe gay and careless humanity."

He found other things to interest him in Bradford besides wool, for he continues: "I had scarcely settled myself in comfort until I was aware that, despite the whirl of machinery, the hurly-burly of commerce, and the roar of goods trains starting cargoes of cloth to every clime, I was located in a veritable treasure trove of legend and romance, of literary achievement and patriotic endeavour; that I was sojourning in a neighbourhood that had produced great novelists, poets, artists, musicians and statesmen."

BRADFORD is the commercial pivot and distributing centre of the Yorkshire Woollen Textile area, which includes Huddersfield, Halifax, Keighley, Dewsbury, Batley, Morley, &c.

The importance of this district and its industries may be gauged from the volume of Raw Wool Imports and Manufactured Woollen Export Trade.

According to the British Board of Trade returns for 1923 these are:—

Total Export Trade of Great Britain $3,713,870,695 (£767,328,656)

Value of Raw-Wool Imports - - - $226,133,463 (£46,721,790)

Australia $103,154,469.88 (£21,312,907) New Zealand $49,509,434.48 (£10,229,222) South Africa $32,328,421.84 (£6,679,426)

Value of Manufactured and Semi-Manufactured Woollen Exports (excluding re-exports) - - - - - $303,195,319 (£62,643,661)

Bradford ranks second only to Liverpool in U.S. Consulates in Great Britain.

There are more cablegrams sent or received through the Bradford General Post Office than any other place in the British Isles, with the exception of London and Liverpool.

Evidence of Bradford's wealth and thrift is seen in the fact that 7 Building Societies operating in the City have combined assets amounting to $159,720,000 (£33,000,000), or one quarter of all the Building Societies' capital of the United Kingdom. Bradford has been well described as "the home of Building Societies"—the working man's Bank.

This extensive British manufacturing area—in which an industrial population of nearly three millions is engaged—can be most directly covered through the BRADFORD PAPERS:—

The Yorkshire Observer

for nearly a century well in the front rank of British provincial daily newspapers, and acknowledged as the highest authority on the Woollen and Worsted Industries. It reaches the commercial classes, and its well-written Women's Pages, regular literary and social features by well-known contributors ensure for it a very definite "home" influence. The one of the brightest and most vigorous British Provincial Evening Newspapers, which regularly carries the advertising of American products distributed in the British Isles, and reaches almost every Bradford home.

LEEDS AND THE WEST RIDING OF YORKSHIRE

LEEDS, its detracters say, is a good place to get away from—and if a native takes offense at that, they explain that they mean it is a convenient centre from which to get about the country.

Certainly Leeds is most favorably placed from the travelling or the distribution point of view. Before the amalgamation of the railways, five companies ran their trains into Leeds. It is on the main Midland line to Scotland from London, and Pullman trains run to it in 3½ hours from London by the other route via Doncaster. Leeds is only 25 miles from York and there are splendid train services connecting it with the great industrial parts of Lancashire.

Bernard Shaw would have Leeds bombarded by heavy artillery, because merely burning it would not be thorough. But the city retains its local pride, even though its City Square must not be mentioned in the breath with Piccadilly Circus.

Leeds is a spending place for people miles around. Lots of the wealthy people who have their businesses or factories there live miles away—at Harrogate or in the country—but they go into Leeds to shop. It is the centre, too, for many of the other smaller industrial towns in the West Riding. When you think of Leeds you must think also of the whole area around it.

Leeds itself has a population of 458,000. Its industries are more diverse than those of our other provincial cities of its size. It is the centre of the clothing industry, but steel, leather, engineering of all kinds, printing and what not claim thousands of workers.

Bradford is only nine miles away. It is know as "Worstedopolis" and just after the war it was said to be a city of millionaires. It is reviving its fortunes by a great campaign to advertise its cloths. It is significant that unemployment in Bradford has been halved in the last four months (12,882 down to 6,265), two-thirds of the decrease being in the textile industry.

Other towns nearby all engaged in some branch or branches of the textile trade are Wakefield, Huddersfield, with a population of 110,000; Halifax, with a rather smaller population; and nearer to Leeds are Morley, Batley, Dewsbury, and Cleckheaton, the last four with a total population running into six figures. Northwest of Leeds are Keighley and Skipton.

Indeed, within a circle of about 15 miles diameter there is here one of the most crowded and busiest parts of England. Naturally, there is a good deal of smoke and dirt about. But the Yorkshireman is proud of it, for "where there's muck there's brass"—and that is not at all a bad proverb for the sales manager in Britain.

"This is where the work's done," the native will tell you and maybe add an uncomplimentary reference to London which he regards as a satellite town living on what the north produces. The census figures rather encourage that view. In this Riding are three-quarters of Yorkshire's four million people and out of every 1,000 males over 14 years of age, 942 are "occupied." It is important to notice, too, that there are half a million women earning money in the West Riding, 34 per cent of them being in the textile industry.

South and Southeast of Leeds—between it and Sheffield is the great Yorkshire coalfield in which is a growing population which should be watched. Barnsley and Doncaster are the principal towns.

Industry extends right to the most southern part of the Riding where Sheffield lies. Sheffield is the biggest city in the Riding and the fifth in England and Wales. She has multiplied herself twelve times in a hundred years and is still a growing market. Of her 490,000 people, over 200,000 are "occupied" and 31 per cent of them are metal workers.

But Sheffield, like Leeds, must be considered along with the great industrial district around it and as a centre for other parts of the country. Rotherham, for instance, has a population of 68,000 and north of it is the densely populated mining district already referred to.

A point to be noticed about the West Riding market is its great diversity. Harrogate, just north of Leeds, is the most fashionable of English health resorts. The Riding also has its stretches of typical English country with parks and country houses, pastures and arable land, its own landed gentry and well-to-do farmers.

The moors are without equal in England. The rest of England knows it and goes there on holiday. The Yorkshireman himself may usually be found on holiday bent, if not in his own Riding, then in his own county, say on the coast at Scarborough, Bridlington or Filey.

Enough has been said to show that in the West Riding of Yorkshire there is a population worth appealing to. As to the means of making that appeal, let it be said that the people support a great number of newspapers of their own. The evening newspapers unlike the morning papers, do not suffer from London competition.

The Conservative morning paper published in Leeds is read all over the county and known all over the country. The two Leeds evening papers have circulations running well into six figures. There is a popular picture morning paper, too, and several weeklies.

Sheffield has its substantial and a less substantial rival and each of these has its evening offshoot. Bradford has a famous Liberal morning paper and two evenings—although so close to Leeds. Huddersfield and Halifax also boast evening papers and York has a morning paper and an evening.

The smaller towns have their weekly papers—one, two or three each. The Yorkshireman is a great lover of sport, and for that reason a sales manager would do well to take notice of the Saturday sports editions of the evening newspapers in the big towns.

Some may doubt whether the Yorkshireman can be induced to part with the cash he undoubtedly earns. Sir Harry Lauder recently said to the present writer that when a Yorkshireman and a Scot came to terms, it was quite certain they had got down to bedrock. The one couldn't get any more; the other couldn't pay any less.

There is something in that, but it should not deter anyone from trying business with a Yorkshireman. (Nearly 4,000 Scots find it worth while to live in Leeds alone!)

The Yorkshireman does not really quite believe that if he does "owt for nowt" he should do it for himself. But he believes in seeing that he is going to get a return for his money, or, in the case of charity, that good use is going to be made of it.

He is not enamored of saving in the Scottish way. If he sees a good thing he will pounce on it and will experience no pain in parting with his money. For that reason many an advertiser with a good article to sell has been able to lay the foundations of success in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

One word more. If you go to Yorkshire you will surely be offered "a Yorkshire tea"—which means a groaning board and speaks of much work in the kitchen. That will suggest the efficiency of the Yorkshire housewife. She is a market in herself.

Praise from Peoria

To Editor & Publisher:—Permit me to offer my congratulations on your 1924 Year Book. If there is any information concerning the newspaper business omitted from its pages, I do not know what it can be. It certainly is very valuable, not only to publishers, but to advertisers as well. You are to be congratulated.

PICCADILLY CIRCUS

Places you have heard of through life, but have never seen, charm the American tourist in London, city of ten thousand curious sights for the observing. In your fiction you have read of the "flower girls" at the fountain in Picadilly Circus. You go there to see them, and find they are boys. But their wares are just as lovely and it is here that the Londoner finds his morning boutonniere, an ornamentation which he readily accepts.

Part of the romance of London is the quaint or picturesque names of streets and squares, in contrast to the common unromantic lettering and numbering of the streets of many American cities. "Tipperary" made Piccadilly famous to the American dough-boy, but to the modern tourist it means a convenient starting place for exploring the West End of London. It extends from the Haymarket to Hyde Park. London is known as a "grey city of commerce," but scattered through out its length and breadth are little green spots and gems of ornamentation, such as that depicted in this photograph of the famous Circus.

Getting hold of 9 Millions

The great Industrial North is almost a country in itself and it's a favourite "tryout" ground for advertisers. Nine million people in the two counties of Yorkshire and Lancashire alone!—makers of money and prodigal spenders, but they spend in their own way.

To influence their spending you must know them—know their outlook and their mode of life.

We do know them.

Let us convince them of the value of your goods.

BRADFORD—THE CITY THAT "SAYS NOWT"

ON a large scale map it is possible to find Bradford, Yorkshire, but it is easily missed. When you have heard or have declined to hear all the statistics that can be compiled about its population of nearly 300,000—and the city has pangs of mortification that it is only "nearly"—about its vast acreage, about the fact that from one extreme boundary of it to another is a distance of about 12 miles, about the number of millionaires that it houses to the square mile, about its highly-specialized accent, and its back-to-back houses, you know a little about it. Delving a little deeper into the morass of figures you find that it handles the greater part of the 400 to 500-odd or more varieties of wool there are in the world, and that it is pre-eminent for the production of worsted—not woolens mark you, which are another thing altogether, but worsted, WORSTED, WORSTED—and that for the combination of qualities of making and spending money it takes second place to no other city, town village or hamlet anywhere on God's earth.

You find that about sixty cinema theatres and several other places of amusement expect to be supported in Bradford, and that for the style of its architecture, from the Town Hall to the Wool Exchange, it borrows from Siena, Florence and other Italian towns—or rather that it did borrow, long years ago, and has covered its great buildings with the industrial smoke and grime of generations.

Then you find that for it public health services it is the model town in England, and that deputations come from abroad to visit its clinics, nursery schools, its public baths, and its "conditioning house" where samples of wool, hair and other spinnable and weavable products are tested, under the aegis of the Corporation, and their birth certificates and standards of quality are-er-certified.

Even then, it is easy to miss Bradford even on a large scale map. For to all intents and purposes Bradford has overgrown its industrial boundaries, and a couple of dozen of smaller towns round and about the hub of Worstedopolis are all within its manufacturing orbit. This is the secret of the singular reticence which enshrouds and will always enshroud the city. When trade is looking black—it was once prophesied, to the scorn of ensuing generations, that grass would grow in its streets, following the depression which succeeded a boom period towards the end of the last century—the Bradford which counts says nothing, except in moments of overwhelming exasperation.

The fact is that within a comparatively small space, as modern transport facilities go, Bradford and its environs—hereinafter comprehensively referred to simply as Bradford—are a self-contained region in all that pertains to the manufacturing, dyeing, finishing and merchanting of its staple products. By the luck of fortune everything that it wants is there to be used, except the raw material, and Bradford has become accustomed to expect its raw material to come along sooner or later, and more or less surely, by reason of those other things that it possesses.

The only point which worries the business brains of the city at the present time—the chief big worry that is—concerns the amount of skilled labor which will be available when, as certainly as the going round of the earth once a year, the world begins to pour in its next boom orders. For mark you, now that the recovery expected is beginning to make itself felt, Bradford finds that during the slump it exported too many of its operatives to other countries and that it will want them back again before long.

On this one point, employers and operatives are in the main agreed, as also are the managements of the two important English League football teams which the city boasts and their colleagues of the amusement places already mentioned, not to mention the hotel and boarding house keepers at Blackpool, Morecambe and other seaside resorts where the democracy of the northern towns and cities spills itself on the yellow sands for a fortnight's orgy of sunshine and salt-water and motor-coach outings some time in August and for lesser orgies at Easter and Whitsuntide.

For, as we have seen, Bradford can spend as well as make money.

That this difficulty of prospective labor shortage is very much in mind is indicated by the fact that at a meeting of the Textile Institute recently, in Manchester, John Emsley, the president, who happens to be one of the biggest manufacturers in Bradford, expressed the opinion, apropos of statements by other speakers to the same effect on the subject of the recovery of the Lancashire cotton industry, that if all the machinery in Bradford standing idle at the present time were required to be put into motion there would hardly be enough labor available to do it.

It was John Emsley, by the way, who expressed in blunt Bradford fashion some time back, when the question of a tariff was being debated by the leading men of the industry, that Bradford would come out of its industrial difficulties as it had done on previous occasions by the aid of—its brains.

That is another point about Bradford which may be missed in volumes dealing with output and in charts of production and prices. By the brains of Bradford you have to understand not mere cerebration in the ordinary sense but something which has been handed down from the old days when wool was washed in the streams in which the West Riding abounded and was combed and woven by hand. The operatives of today are the descendants of operatives. All down through the time of the industrial revolution in Britain until the present day has the skill of hand and eye, together with an instinct which is the outcome of the development of them both, been handed and if you want the best men for dealing with wool you must sooner or later get back to Bradford. And on the whole the employers and the employed have had the sense to work amicably together, which counts for a good deal in so complex and baffling an industry as that in which they are concerned.

These are some of the reasons why Bradford—to use its own idiom—"says nowt." It has no pressing need to say anything.

Even until quite recently people have been in the habit of wondering where Bradford is and what it does. Bradford has amused itself, however, by staging at the Wembley Exhibition, in the Palace of Industry, a magnificient exhibit, complete even to a mannequin parlor, which has excited the interest and admiration of many thousands of visitors who have been astonished to find that stuff of such excellence, both in design and quality, comes from the West Riding of Yorkshire. Then, just to buck things up a bit and bring the boom period a little nearer, an "Advertising Bradford" campaign was recently started which has worked wonders, in conjunction with the Wembley exhibition, in focussing the attention of the world on the products of the city.

Bradford lays itself out to clothe civilization in the clothes of civilization. Just at the moment, however, civilization is experiencing a rainy day, and although the weather is clearing up a bit, Bradford has its umbrella up. When the clouds have lifted it is a sure thing that Worstedopolis will be dry and smiling, still saying very little, but there—cheerfully as ever—ready to do quite a number of big things with those 400 to 500-odd varieties of wool, alpaca, mohair and what-not which comes from all over the world to be made into cloths of finest quality, and in particular into the ladies' dress goods on which it prides itself with an almighty and wholly justifiable pride.

The intelligent will gather that the city that "says nowt" can sometimes speak to advantage.

Of Special Interest to Delegates Visiting Yorkshire

During your stay in Bradford, the famous centre of the Woollen and Worsted Industry, make a point of inspecting BOLLING HALL. You naturally ask: Why? Let me tell you. Bolling Hall is the ancestral home of Mrs. Wilson, the widow of the late President Wilson. Parts of Bolling Hall, which is now a municipal museum of antiquities, are reputed to have been built over 500 years ago and it is still a venerable and stately pile, standing testimony to thoroughly conscientious workmanship.

YORKSHIRE and LANCASHIRE, with a population of nine millions, mostly of an industrial nature, offer a wonderfully productive field for advertisers, but they should enlist

The Chairman, Mr. F. C. Macaskie, and the Directors of the Yorkshire Evening NEWS extend the most cordial greetings to all delegates and their friends who are visiting the coasts of Britain, the little island set in the silver sea. London is London and Yorkshire is Yorkshire. Leeds, in the rich, populous, responsive West Riding, is the home of the Yorkshire Evening NEWS, but the fame of the journal is widespread through the land. Last summer in the great Open Professional Golf Championship arranged by the Yorkshire Evening NEWS, American players like Hagen and Sarazen took part and had the time of their lives, so royal is the hospitality of Yorkshire. To all visitors this word of greeting sincerely is given. May London be the brightest lamp yet in the history of the Conventions of the A. A. C. of W.! And may great and golden hours delight you all!

Tour C: To Yorkshire

Delegates will arrive in Yorkshire Monday afternoon, July 21, and will be met by a fleet of motor cars, and a run will be taken into the beautiful Derbyshire country, visiting Baslow, Chatsworth Park, Rowsley, Bakewell, Monsal Dale, calling at the Marquis of Granby, Bamford, for tea. They will then depart for Sheffield. In the evening cars will be in attendance at the respective hotels to convey visitors to Sheffield Town Hall, where an official reception and banquet will be given.

On July 22 the delegates will be conducted over one or other of the following works—Vickers, Browns, Cammells, Firths, Hadfields, Edgar Allen, and will be entertained to lunch. In the afternoon lighter trade centers will be visited—Walker & Hall, Mappin & Webb, where tea will be served.

Delegates will leave by motor car for Bradford, arriving in time for dinner.

Delegates will be taken to Leeds on Thursday morning by motor car. They will receive a Civic Reception, will make a tour of industries, clothing, engineering, printing, etc. There will be an interval for lunch. In the afternoon they will visit Leeds University, Kirkstall Abbey, etc., and in the evening there will be a Banquet.

Delegates will be taken to Hull by motor car on Friday morning. There will be a civic reception by the Mayor and Corporation, then the party will be conducted round the docks. Lunch will be taken at the Guildhall. In the afternoon a tour will be made of the town, and then the party will be conveyed by motor car to Scarborough.

Arriving at Scarborough on Friday evening, they will be welcomed by the Mayor and Corporation. It is Scarborough's idea to give the delegates as much time as possible "out of doors" and special facilities will be provided for playing tennis and golf. Free tickets will be given for the Floral Hall and Spa, and places of interest in the neighborhood will be visited. They will leave Scarborough for London on July 28.

Those who have signified their going are as follows:

Tour E: Lancashire

This party of 100 delegates will visit Liverpool, Port Sunlight and Manchester.

The delegates will leave London at mid-day on Sunday, July 20, arriving at Liverpool about 5 o'clock. They will have dinner at their hotels and in the evening there will be an informal reception at the Adelphi Hotel, with musical program.

On July 21 a visit will be made to Exchanges. Lunch will be taken at the State Cafe. In the afternoon there will be an official reception at the Town Hall and in the evening a banquet.

On Tuesday a visit will be made to the docks and shipyards. A river trip will be taken and there will be a reception at Wallasey Town Hall, a visit to Knowsley Hall and in the evening a banquet at the Exchange Hotel.

On Wednesday a visit will be made to the Cathedral, St. George's Hall and main buildings; a town survey or a race party and a farewell banquet in the evening at the North Western Hotel, with musical program.

The delegates will leave Liverpool Landing Stage at 9 o'clock on Thursday morning by river steamer for Eastham Ferry. On arrival they will motor to Port Sunlight. A short time will be spent at the Lady Lever Art Gallery and from thence they will be driven to one of the village halls for a reception by the directors of Messrs. Lever Bros., Ltd., and luncheon will be served.

After lunch the party will be escorted round the factories, then tea will be served. They will motor to Woodside Ferry and go via Liverpool to Manchester.

The delegates will leave Manchester for London about mid-day on Saturday, July 26.

Tour F: Southwest England

This party will visit Torquay, Bristol, Bath and Weston-super-Mare.

The delegates will arrive at Torquay on Monday afternoon, July 21, and a civic reception will be given to them by the Mayor and Corporation. Motor coach tours will be taken in the beautiful Devonshire country and a trip will be made up the River Dart. The party will be entertained to a banquet and an entertainment will be provided at the Pavilion.

On July 25 the delegates will take the train to Bristol.

There they will be received by the Mayor and Corporation. Various important works will be visited. A visit will be made to Frome, the Wye Valley and Cheddar Cliffs.

A day's visit will be made to the quaint old town of Bath on Friday, July 25. Tour will be made of the city, including the famous 18th century baths, hot springs and pump room. They will motor into the surrounding country and will be entertained at luncheon by the Mayor and Corporation and the Bath Chamber of Commerce. The delegates will leave Bath for Bristol about 6 o'clock.

The delegates will be taken by special train to Weston-super-Mare each evening from Bristol and Bath, where hotel accommodation will be provided. This is a very popular west of England resort, noted for its beautiful sands and delightful bathing.

Leave for London on Saturday morning, July 26.

Tour G: Midlands

This party will visit Birmingham, Bournville, Coventry and Wolverhampton.

The complete program for Birmingham is not yet prepared, but it will include a civic reception, a banquet, and visits to all the principal industrial establishments.

Messrs. Cadbury Bros., Ltd., of cocoa fame, will entertain the delegates and devote half a day to showing them over their well-known factory at Bournville.

Those who have signified their going are as follows:

Berger, Mr. M. Russell
Goldstein, Mr. and Mrs. Phil
Kunkel, Wm. D.
Rassieur, T. Edward
Squires, Mr. H. C.

Tour H: Cathedrals

Visiting the following cities: Norwich, Peterborough, York, Durham, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The Norwich Cathedral was founded in 1096, and is one of the most perfect examples of Norman architecture to be found in England. Norwich abounds in the most interesting architectural remains, including the ancient castle with its splendid Norman keep.

The Peterborough Cathedral is a noble edifice, its vast front being unsurpassed by any other in the kingdom.

York is a very ancient city. It is enclosed by walls pierced by four principal gates.

The city of Durham dates from the 10th century. The fine cathedral containing the tomb of the Venerable Bede (d. 735) dates from 1093. The castle is said to have been erected by William the Conqueror, and the university was founded by Cromwell in 1646.

Newcastle was originally called Pons Aelii, from a bridge erected (120) by the Emperor Hadrian. Its modern name originated from a fortress of which the keep still remains, built by the son of William the Conqueror. The old Roman Wall is one of the greatest sights of the neighborhood.

Those who have signified their going are as follows:

Tour I: Belfast

A great welcome awaits delegates who intend to visit Belfast. They will be formally received by representatives of the Government of North Ireland. The corporate bodies in Belfast will also participate in the entertainment of the delegates, which is being specially planned by the committees of the Ulster Club.

The members of the Ulster Club wish to show the delegates first industrial Ulster, and they will have the opportunity of seeing seven of the biggest factories of their kind in the world centred in Belfast. They will be given ample opportunity to examine the world-famous Irish linen manufactured in Ulster.

The delegates will have an opportunity of traveling to Newcastle in County Down, or Portrush in County Antrim, and playing over two of the finest sea-side golf courses in the world.

"London Bridge Is All Built Up," we used to chant on summer evenings when we were youngsters. So did our grandfathers and so will our grandchildren. Centuries pass, but London Bridge and the Tower are eternal. Monuments to British skill with soldier sword and craftsman's trowel, they are also keys to the character of the present-day citizens of the United Kingdom.

London & North Eastern Railway of England and Scotland

What to see in Britain

DELEGATES to the Advertising Convention will see from a glance at the map on page 74 that London North Eastern Britain contains all the different types of scenery, holiday resorts, old-world towns and industrial centres which, according to their own particular inclinations, they may wish to see—all are linked with London by the London and North Eastern Railway.

Those who delight in gazing upon time-worn relics of antiquity or upon stirring events of 1,000 years ago will find much to appeal to them in this part of Britain.

Of noble monastic ruins in every variety of beautiful site there are many, and some of the most glorious Cathedrals in Europe are situated along the trunk route from London to Edinburgh and the heart of Scotland.

There are also the places associated with some of the great men of the Island, the homes of the Washingtons and of the Pilgrim Fathers, of William Penn, John Bunyan and Milton, all easily accessible. It should not be forgotten that the Eastern side of England is the "Cradle of the American Nation."

Literary shrines are met with throughout the country. The land of Scott is perhaps the most important, but to this great name may be added those of Charles Dickens, Laurence Sterne, Tennyson, Hume, Dryden and others.

Great figures in history are associated with a hundred places, and almost every inch of London North Eastern Britain is haunted or hallowed by the memories of famous men and women who make up the strangely fascinating pageant of history.

The fact that there are three chief (L. N. E. R.) terminal stations in London enables the holder of a return ticket to Scotland to journey in either direction by a choice of three alternative routes, thus an interesting tour can be carried out with the same ticket.

EAST COAST ROUTE

KING'S CROSS AND SCOTLAND

SHORTEST AND QUICKEST

Princes Street, Edinburgh

IT is doubtful whether another City throughout the length and breadth of Europe can compare with Edinburgh for splendour of situation, and an urban thoroughfare which rivals its Princes Street will be difficult to discover.

From the ramparts of the Castle the view spread out to the North, and right over the Forth Eastward, explains at once the reason for calling Edinburgh "the Athens of the North." The magnificent groupings of volcanic hills and scarps close at hand, and across the estuary, make picturesque and inspiring every view.

ON a picturesque corner of the coast of Fife stands St. Andrews, at one time the ecclesiastical capital of Scotland, and now a university town of considerable importance.

To all lovers of Golf, however, St. Andrews makes its appeal as the home of the "Royal and Ancient Game." The very air seems to be impregnated with the spirit of the game and delegates should not miss the opportunity of playing over these famous links—only then will they fully understand why St. Andrews is always spoken of in superlatives.

way of England and Scotland

THE ARTERY OF INDUSTRIAL BRITAIN

THE London and North Eastern Railway serves the whole of the East of Great Britain between London and the North of Scotland, in addition to extensive areas in the centre and west of both England and Scotland—it may truly be termed the artery of Industrial Britain.

It is the greatest Dock Owning Railway in the world, possessing 38 Docks, 38 miles of quays and 210 coal shipping berths.

In a normal year it carries 300,000,000 passengers (exclusive of season ticket holders) and over 180,000,000 tons of goods and minerals.

Of the total output of coal in Great Britain 40% is raised from Collieries directly served by the London and North Eastern Railway.

Another of the great industries served is that of shipbuilding. The tonnage launched on the North East Coast is considerably more than half of the output of the British Isles, whilst 90% of the shipbuilding in Great Britain is at ports served by the Company.

In the West Riding of Yorkshire and Lancashire the railway serves an immense productive area both for woolens and textiles.

More than half the Pig Iron made in the United Kingdom is produced within the area served by the Company and there are important iron and steel works of all kinds with their attendant industries.

There are other industries too numerous to mention in the huge area served by the London and North Eastern Railway, and therefore those Delegates who desire to see something of the industrial life of Britain can combine business with pleasure by travelling over this great Company's system, which not only serves so well holiday resorts and other places of interest, but also the industrial centres of England and Scotland.

RETAIL SECTIONS

London is the largest centre of the wholesale and retail trades in the United Kingdom, and is remarkable for the immense number of small one-shop businesses as compared with the larger stores of American cities. Further, each district has well-defined local shopping areas, and, in addition, Central London is characterized by the number of thoroughfares that have become identified with certain trades in which the principal houses engaged are to be found.

Fleet Street—Newspapers, etc.
Great Portland St. and Longacre—Automobiles.
Oxford St. and High St., Kensington—Dry Goods and Notions.
Curtain Road, E. C.—Furniture, wholesale.
Tottenham Court Rd.—Furniture, retail.
City Road and Clerkenwell—Gramophones and Records.
Hatton Garden—Diamond Merchants.
Holborn Viaduct—Cycles.
Charing Cross Road—Second-hand Booksellers.

The important shopping streets of the City are Cheapside and Bishopsgate; of the West End, Holborn and Oxford Street to the Marble Arch, Regent Street from Oxford Circus to Picadilly Circus, Picadilly to Old Bond Street and the Strand from Charing Cross to Wellington Street. Bond Street (Old and New) is the Fifth Avenue of London. Further west, the Edgware Road, for about a mile, and after another mile residential break, the shopping centre for North West London at Kilburn and Brondesbury. In the extreme west, Hammersmith Broadway, Eastward from the City, the shopping centres are Shoreditch, Mile End Road, Ilford and Stratford. Northward from the City are Islington, Highbury, Holloway, Finsbury Park, Kentish Town, and Wood Green. In the south, beyond the river, are the Elephant and Castle, Kensington, Deptford, Clapham and Brixton. In every case, the shopping is concentrated upon a common centre, usually distinguished by one or more dry goods stores situated upon a main traffic artery.

LIVERPOOL—WESTERN GATEWAY

occupies a commanding position in the city, and completes a fine ensemble.

The Town Hall is the centre of a district where many fine structures are discoverable, the various exchanges, banks, insurance offices and the like being imposing edifices.

Worthy of note, also, is the group of buildings at the Pier Head, consisting of the palatial Dock Board Offices, the Cunard Building and the Royal Liver Building, the latter towering 290 feet high. The Head Post Office, the Municipal Offices, the Government Buildings, the new Cotton Exchange, and new Cathedral, the massive shops and offices, strike the stranger with a sense of the wealth and importance of the city.

The University of Liverpool is a standing monument to the benefactors who took part in providing it. The leading hotels of Liverpool not only add to the beauty of the city architecturally but ensure perfect comfort to visitors. Of late years several of Liverpool's shops have advanced considerably both in dimensions and in methods, and may be ranked with the greatest modern emporia.

Better-class buyers go to the Bold street shops (the Bond street of Liverpool) but many excellent shops are situated in and around Church street, Lord street, Castle street, and other leading thoroughfares. Liverpool shops appeal not only to the residents but to a wide field of buyers from surrounding districts. Other buyers catered to are the American, Colonial, and Continental travellers, who visit the port in considerable numbers. They purchase clothing and like essentials for their personal use or to take back to friends, as they are often able to buy such goods to better advantage in England. The Grand National and other race meetings held at Aintree also attract many thousands of visitors and potential buyers to Liverpool. Visitors are delighted with the Liverpool cafés, with which there is nothing to compare outside London.

Liverpool has a great deal to interest the visitor in its famour river, shipping, docks, and commerce. Further, it is an excellent centre from which to visit Llandrudno, North Wales, the Isle of Man, and the Lake District. Interesting places in the immediate neighborhood include the richly wooded peninsula of the Wirral, lying between the estuaries of the Dee and the Mersey, with Hoylake, West Kirby, New Brighton, Wallasey, and Port Sunlight, as places well worth visiting. A little further afield are such well-known places of interest as historic Chester, sunny Southport, and breezy Blackpool.

Supremacy!

The Space Barometer which the "Newspaper World" compiles and publishes monthly proves that the

Liverpool Echo

is the greatest evening advertising medium in the Kingdom, carrying more advertisements than any other provincial penny paper, morning or evening, its total being exceeded by only one London penny paper (THE ECHO'S "smalls" alone often exceed 2000 daily.)

and that the

is by far the greatest and most popular daily advertising medium outside Manchester for the district of Lancashire, Cheshire, North Wales, and the North-West generally.

THIS REPUTATION HAS BEEN BUILT UP ON HEALTHY CIRCULATION AND EFFICIENT SERVICE.

The Liverpool Weekly Post

is the favourite weekly among the working classes of the industrial North-West of England and Wales.

Freer (director of the Freer Advertising Agency); secretary, Muriel G. Atkins (advertisement department, Odhams Press, Ltd.). This club was formed in May, 1923, and has now 220 members. Affiliated with the A. A. C. W. H. Turner Widgery acting as representative on the General Committee of District 14. Miss Debenham represents the women members on the women's entertainment committee.

MAJOR T. WORSWICK

The Regent Club hopes to entertain the three junior delegates who are attending the convention as the guests of the senior club of New York and has applied to the entertainment committee for this privilege. Headquarters, The Polytechnic, 309 Regent street. W. 1.

Women's Advertsiing Club of London—President, Miss Marion Jean Lyon (advertisement manager, Punch); secretary, Miss Kathleen MacLachlan (W. S. Crawford, Ltd., Advertising Agents). The club was formed September, 1923, with the aim to widen the range of advertising vision by the addition of authortative women's activities. The membership already amounts to 32. The club is the outcome of a promise made by Miss MacLachlan at last year's convention that a real women's advertising club would be in existence in London before the 1924 convention. The club is in charge of the entertainment to be provided for the American ladies during the convention, and a special committee has been formed to take care of this important section. Miss MacLachlan is secretary of the Women's Federated Clubs of the World, and the club is looking after the business of the Federated Clubs during the convention. Headquarters, 233 High Holborn, W. C. 1.

"Looked Back Upon With Happy Memories"

LORD ASHFIELD

Chairman of the Underground Undertakings

LAST year I expressed the hope that the 1924 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World might be held in London. I am indeed glad that this hope is to be fulfilled, and at a time so fortunate; for the linking of the convention with the great Empire Exhibition must inevitably ensure that the results of the visit will be even more far-reaching than would be the case in a normal year.

May I assure the delegates that their visit to this country will be of inestimable value, not only to British advertising but also to international trade. London, I know, will extend to them a most sincere and hearty welcome, and I can only add that it is my firm conviction that the 1924 convention will prove to be not only no less successful than its predecessors, but one which will be looked back upon with happy memories of great achievement.

dent, Dr. Lombard Murphy; hon. secretary, Brian D. O'Kennedy; hon. treasurer, F. M. Summerfield. Formed Dec. 6, 1923, and the number of members is approximately 100. The club is sending a delegation to the convention, and is arranging with the authorities in London for speakers from the Free State to participate in the convention proceedings. The club is also arranging to receive a number of delegates, probably about 250, in Dublin, where a reception and series of entertainments will be provided.

"The Invigorating Influence the Convention Will Have"

SIR WILLIAM E. BERRY

Chairman of the Berry Group of Newspapers

I FEEL sure that the American delegates to the forthcoming advertising convention will need no assurance as to the great welcome they will get in England.

It will be a sincere and I hope, a memorable, welcome; not only because we on this side appreciate so fully the invigorating influence the convention will have on British advertising and on international trade generally, but also because we look forward to this new opportunity of renewing and strengthening the many ties of good fellowship that already exist between us.

Savoy Hotel Headquarters, James W. Brown, President, of Editor & Publisher.

AT YOUR SERVICE

EDITOR & PUBLISHER is frankly gratified by this number devoted to the cause of international advertising and good will among the world's disciples of the printed word as an instrument for the advancement of commerce and trade.

H. C. Ridout

This is the largest issue ever printed by this trade journal, the largest and most complete issue of any paper devoted to advertising, and there are only a few instances of larger trade paper issued in any field.

Editor & Publisher appreciatively acknowledges the support of the advertising interests herein represented, which made possible a truly representative trade paper souvenier of the Twentieth Annual Convention of the A.A.C.W., at Wembley, London, England, attracting a delegation of more than 2,000 from America alone, and by all odds the most important and significant event in the history of organized advertising.

H. Rea Fitch

Everyone who is acquainted with the Texas type of American will thoroughly enjoy and value the enterprising note struck in these columns by the leaders of advertising, journalism and business in that great empire of the Southwest. Houston, gem city of the Lone Star State, earnestly and irresistibly demands the 1925 convention of the Advertising Clubs of the World, and in this number our friends have their full say, confident that the pledge of Atlantic City shall be fulfilled. "On-to-Houston, 1925," promises to be the slogan of the Wembley convention and it is typical of the dauntless Texan to deliver the message in the broad and convincing terms of the "Texas Next" section of this number

To Herbert C. Ridout, London Editor of Editor & Publisher, responsibility for the extraordinarily thorough covering of the overseas editorial interest of this number, and to H. Rea Fitch, special commissioner of Editor & Publisher responsible for assembling the brilliant array of the special business announcements in this number, a public note of appreciation is well earned and cordially extended.

Some of the American Products which have been successfully marketed in Great Britain through Advertising.

A Few Facts Concerning the British Market

COMPARED to the United States of America, The United Kingdom, including the Irish Free State, represents a very small piece of the Earth's crust, and people accustomed to large areas and great distances are slow to realise how this influences the handling of the market. For instance, all the chief Industrial Centres are but at a few hours' rail journey from London, and in many instances a man leaving London in the morning can visit his customers in a Provincial Town, returning to London in time for dinner.

Without doubt, this compactness not only makes London by far the most dominating centre for business generally, but also has a peculiar influence on the Newspaper situation, and explains why the London Morning Newspapers obtain their wide National Circulation, as it is possible to deliver them in the Provinces by breakfast time. On the other hand The United Kingdom is far more closely populated than the United States, as the following figures show:—

United States	31	persons per square mile.
England	701	" " " "
Scotland	160	" " " "
Wales	296	" " " "
Ireland	134	" " " "

Further, the bulk of the population is concentrated in large Cities and Industrial areas, approximately only 13% of the total population being engaged in Agriculture.

From these broad facts it is evident that the British Market differs fundamentally from that of the United States of America, and requires close investigation before launching Selling & Advertising plans.

To American Manufacturers & Merchants wishful to investigate the British Market we extend a hearty invitation either to visit us or to get in touch with us by letter—we can assure them of our hearty co-operation.

MAN PAYS BUT WOMAN CHOOSES AND BRITISH ADVERTISE TO WOMEN

.uch Copy Ostensibly Aimed at Men is Subtly Directed at Persuasion of Women—The Buying Influence Being the Feminine Prerogative

By H. G. SAWARD

Managing Director, Saward, Baker & Co., Ltd., London

SOMEONE who was too tired to think out a really clever epigram once said hat woman was the riddle of the uni-erse.

If he had said that at a debating ociety, he would have drawn the retort hat man is a bit of a conundrum.

Both views would have been the subject or argument. There could be no argu-ient about the statement that woman is he real buyer.

That is true, whether the woman be an merican, a Britisher or a Thibetan. lo wonder 75 per cent of the advertising ppearing in Great Britain is directed olely to the woman. The other 25 per ent is directed ostensibly to the man.

Man pays the bills—always. He plays he musical instrument but the woman alls the tune.

And while these are universal plati-udes, it is really true that the British oman is more of a woman than any ther woman in the world. With due nd proper respect to the American oman, she is so flattered by the Ameri-an man that she has taken on more of he masculine temperament than has the ritish woman.

The British woman is essentially con-ervative. She is almost as much con-ervative as Queen Victoria. With this ifference, that she is a 20th century ictorian and not a 19th century Victor-an. She does not in point of literal fact emand what is known as a "Victoria," he does demand a Rolls-Royce or a ord accordingly to the ability she has of aking her husband earn money.

The British advertising agent has not arned his lesson. He has been taught this esson by woman; he flatters himself hat he has introduced woman to adver-sing; he has done nothing of the sort, t the most he has had the good sense o realize that if his advertising is to be ffective, he must cease to have his own ay.

You may say "So has the American." here is just this difference; that the ritish woman and the American woman re fundamentally alike, but different in etail.

Let us give a few examples. Until re-ently, the British woman was so im-ressed with the intricacies of mechanical atters, that she did not realize her ower in regard to motor car purchase. oday she does. Thus today the adver-ising agent sells motor cars to women, esterday he tried to sell them to men. here are still motor-car advertisers who ely entirely upon an appeal to logic. The stute motor-car manufacturer appeals to ogic, but appeals to the woman's sense f niceness.

Only a woman knows what is a oman's sense of niceness and although otor-car copy that embodies niceness, ay be written by a man, it should be fluenced by a woman.

It does not matter whether it is motor-ars or baby foods. Take Glaxo for in-tance. Glaxo is one of the biggest uccesses in this country. It is certainly rue to say that Glaxo's advertising suc-ess depends upon a correct blending of he emotional appeal to woman and an ppeal to the logic of womanhood.

And even so if you studied the Glaxo dvertising for the last twelve months ou would find that much of it was irected to paternal pride. This is where he sure instinct of woman in advertising ells. Paradoxical? No.

Take Gibbs, of Dentifrice fame. No ne would claim that cleanliness of the eeth is a special prerogative of woman. ibbs have not appealed specially to oman, as woman, they have appealed to he children through the woman and the an. That is correct psychology. It would be stupid sentimentalism to argue that a woman cares more for children than a man does, but it would be more stupid reasoning to argue that it is the man who insists upon the children clean-ing their teeth. That is the special job of the woman, and that is why Gibbs have sold Dentifrice extensively to the children. The Gibbs Fairy Books, which can be read with great delight by the children, were not written for children at all. They were written for the mothers of children —and fathers of children read them in their better moments. But the whole family used Gibbs Dentifrice, which is precisely what Gibbs wanted.

It may be said by our American readers that all this is true of America and they may ask in what respect the advertising of an American product in this country should differ from the advertising of the same product in America.

One can only speak out of one's own experience. I have had the experience in advertising Pompeian Toilet Specialities in this country. In conjunction with my male and female colleagues I inspired copy that did not differ in essentials from American copy for Pompeian, but that differed vitally in detail. To be dangerously frank I capitalized the English woman's love of a sensational fiction story—a different type of fiction story from the American type—and based a good deal of Pompeian advertising upon the sentimental fiction appeal. That has paid Pompeian. Based upon American fiction appeal, I doubt if it would have paid Pompeian.

But we have a long way to go in adjusting our advertising copy to the hand that holds the purse-strings. It is a really astounding fact that the insurance companies of Great Britain have never yet thoroughly adapted their copy to woman. Considering practically nobody but a woman gains by insurance, it is almost unbelievable that we go on filling our insurance advertisements with dull and uninteresting statistics about the financial condition of an insurance company. Indeed we advertise insurance very little in this country. We rely upon the personal canvass. So much have we relied upon the personal canvass, that it has become a music-hall joke. One day we we shall advertise insurance.

It is the same with novels and books of travel. You may be surprised to learn it, but it is a fact that nobody buys books in this country. We only borrow them. A novel that sells 40,000 copies is a gigantic success. An energetic publisher could make 400,000 women ashamed of not possessing any given book.

Any woman could tell him how to do that.

Whether it is true of women the world over that they are international in outlook, I would not pretend to hazard an opinion, but I think it is true—British women are international in outlook. In other words, they will buy American goods if the American appeal is the best appeal and if the American goods advertised are up to their standard of requirement. This reminds me of a conversation with one of your American people who came to this country to find out why the American bacon proposition was anathema here.

I told this gentleman that the women of Great Britain were "sick and tired of your war bacon," and that our women would not have it at any price. It was a fact that American war bacon killed the demand for American bacon for the time being at any rate. The English taste for bacon is different from the American taste. But the English women did not refuse the American bacon because it was American bacon but because they did not like it.

If you have goods that the English-women like, you can advertise them and sell them here. The first important thing to find out is, if they like it and that is where you need the British advertising woman's point of view.

To summarize this article there are two things to remember. One is that advertising in England you must do what you do all the world over, that is appeal to women. Second, that the difference between the British women and any other is apparently indefinite, very obscure, but very real.

EDINBURGH—SCOTLAND'S CAPITAL

NO CITY in the world presents a grander or more varied prospect than the grey metropolis of the north. Year by year it attracts thousands of visitors who, in their admiration of its imposing Castle, its romantic Palace and Abbey of Holyrood, and its natural beauties of hill and sea, are apt to overlook the fact that it is an industrial and commercial city of peculiar importance.

As the capital of Scotland, Edinburgh is the seat of the law courts and government offices, the centre of Scottish art, literature and education, and the headquarters of the chief Scottish banks and insurance offices. In it reside many retired, leisured and wealthy persons. But industries of great importance have long flourished in Edinburgh and district, and since the Burgh of Leith and certain suburban districts were included in the city, increasing its population to about 450,000 and its area to 32,400 acres, conditions are favorable for the extension of existing industries and the establishment of new ones.

Many trades have found the advantages of Edinburgh so unique that they have been able to build up a world-wide connection. Edinburgh is the greatest printing centre for its size in the Kingdom. It is the largest book-binding centre out of London; its brewing industry is of extraordinary importance; it is the headquarters of the biggest distillery combine extant; Midlothian paper manufacturers have made their produce the standard of excellence throughout the trade; and its position in the manufacture of paper-making machinery and in the drug and chemical trade is undisputed.

A large portion of Edinburgh's commerce is a thing of yesterday as compared with the city's age and history. The great book-printing industry as now organized is a plant of only 70 years' growth. Its flour mills, its biscuit factories, its drug trade, its mining, its engineering shops, to mention only a few of its industries, are all entirely modern.

Many factories have tended to produce these as, for instance, the opening up of a new and enormous coal-field, splendid railway facilities, the possession of a great and rapidly extending seaport, its limitless water supply, its unequalled, well managed, cheap electric power (the latest extension of which was opened recently by His Majesty the King), its proximity to the Naval Base at Rosyth, its intimate touch with the great distributing centres of the Continent, complete facilities for technical education, extremely low municipal rates, adaptability of its local labor to a wide variety of trades, due partly to efficient educational facilities and partly to the innate characteristics of the Scot, and lastly the city's extraordinarily equable climate.

Foremost among Edinburgh's industries is the printing and publishing of books. It had its origin in the history and long association with the famous authors and the great works which they produced in the Augustan age of Edinburgh's literary reputation. The citizens were not slow to see the commercial possibilities which the residence of so many famous writers, chief among whom was Sir Walter Scott, gave them.

It is only fair to the principal printing firms to say that the industry has been greatly increased in volume by their enterprise in attracting to the city printing for the London and American book markets. The reputation attained by this school of printers is world famous, and the mark of an Edinburgh printing house is a hall-mark of first class craftsmanship. Printing and its allied trades give employment to about 12,000 men and women. One of the largest printing and publishing establishments in the world is an Edinburgh firm which turns out from 125,000 to 150,000 cloth-bound books per week.

The presence of so great an industry in the city has led to the establishment of many allied industries, such as book-binding, electrotying, type-casting, etc., but the most important is the paper-making industry. Fine printing, writing, and account-book papers, also art or coated papers for illustrated books and magazines, are produced at the many mills on the River Esk and Water of Leith, where paper for practically every purpose in manufactured.

The only morning newspaper published in the capital of Scotland is the Scotsman, whose offices are not only the largest and most magnificent establishment devoted to the production of newspapers in the world, but they are perfectly equipped in every detail.

Edinburgh maintains the high place it has always enjoyed among the cities of the world in the matter of education, so that it can be said to day with as great force as at any time in its history that the leading industry of Edinburgh is education. Pupils come from all parts of the world to receive their education at its secondary institutions, many of which have a world-wide reputation, while Edinburgh University, with its famous medical school, well merits the praise recently bestowed upon it by His Majesty the King as "the great Scottish seat of learning, which, perhaps, beyond all other universities, attracts to itself the aspiring youth of the Empire."

The city has nearly 100 educational institutions, 3,000 professors and teachers, and over 10,000 students and scholars, apart from children between the ages of five and fourteen receiving compulsory education in the elementary schools. Not the least important and useful of the teaching institutions is the Heriot-Watt Technical and Commercial College, in which the normal enrolment of students (day and evening) is 3,000, and the annual expenditure £20,000. The amount spent in the University, the colleges, and the several schools exceeds £650,000 per

WHAT will this mean for National Advertising?

It is yet premature to endeavour to predict the full extent to which National Advertising will benefit.

As a manufacturer and advertiser, I think that this combined effort of thousands of enthusiasts who aim to improve advertising, will unquestionably result in a far better international understanding of world advertising, and ultimately, the establishment of world business.

Our American brothers can be assured of every endeavour to requite and reciprocate the wonderful hospitality that was accorded to our members in the United States of America.

GLASGOW—SECOND CITY OF THE EMPIRE

GLASGOW—Scotland's largest—never forgets that she is the Second City of the British Empire. Not that she isn't as modest as a really progressive city can be, but her 1,034,000 inhabitants never give her a chance to dismiss the thought of greatness from her placid mind.

The River Clyde drains a thickly populated mining and industrial basin, and the city lies across the Clyde at a point a few miles before the river becomes an estuary. Her position explains most of her growth, her work and—not least—her needs.

Founded in dim antiquity, big enough in 1451 to have a university which today is full of honors and enterprise, the town was preeminently ecclesiastical in the 17th century. Her ancient Cathedral, today one of her glories, was then, as earlier, a centre of pilgrimage which brought trade. In the next century she developed her traditional trade with America and before 1775 grew rich on tobacco.

Then came the industrial era—and Glasgow led it. Recognizing that everything lay to their hands in the Clyde valley—coal, iron ore, skilled tradesmen and a great waterway—her talented sons quietly set about the peaceful revolution of the world. A brief record of their names gives some hint of the wealth of practical experience which lies and has long lain behind the guarantee of "Clyde finish."

James Watt of Greenock is called the inventor of the steam engine. Nobody with an eye for machinery would dispute the compliment, for he transformed such halting models as he had to work on out of all recognition. In 1769 he secured patents for his engine which was soon in use all over the country, at first for draining coal mines and then in every variety of activity.

William Murdoch, the inventor of coal gas for lighting, was born near Glasgow and worked for Watt. He made history by installing gas lighting in Watt's foundry in 1799.

Henry Bell of Glagow was the first European to adapt the steam engine to boats in such a way as to make the steamboat a feasible commercial proposition. He launched his Comet on the waters of the Clyde in 1812. This was the first passenger steamboat, and it ran for eight years. It had a length of 42 feet and a speed of 5 knots—puny ancestor of the giant issue.

David Napier, another Clydeside Scotsman, was among those pioneers the greatest improver of the steamboat. He had made the first boiler for the Comet and he pushed on with the work, inventing later a steeple-engine which dispensed with the unwieldy cross-beam of the original model.

For every engineer who created such spectacular and epoch-making advances there were a dozen at work inventing and perfecting processes of the less picturesque appeal. Glasgow took the lead for example in developing bleaching methods, cotton mills, blast furnaces and the technique of the hundred and one trades which had rudimentary beginnings in her midst. A curious feature of Glasgow's life is that no industry once commenced has been allowed to lapse—with the exception of salmon-fishing in the Clyde!

From the general point of view these diverse industries are auxiliary to the Clyde's big business—shipbuilding. With a clear lead over the world Glasgow settled down throughout the century to build the world's best.

SHIPS! From dainty yachts and humble coasters to the Aquitania and the ill-fated Lusitania, tramps, lighters dredges, tugs—sail, steam or oil-burning—the Clyde in quantity and quality has had an output unrivalled by the world.

In 1913, the last year of peace, the Clyde launched one-third of the total tonnage output of the United Kingdom which in that year amounted to more than half of the world's output. The figures for the Clyde as given in Lloyd's Register were 230 vessels of 751,590 tons, with propelling engines of 349,329 indicated horse power.

No other single shipbuilding and engineering area in the United Kingdom or in the world anywhere nearly approached the Clyde figures.

And this is not all. During the war the Clyde engineering works switched over a large measure to the production of war material—shells, torpedoes, destroyers, battleships—and performed wonders in output. The improvements and extensions of machinery in the Clyde area, now devoted, except for warships, to the gentler works of peace, have been the subject of a special enquiry by authoritative economists. Today they calculate the productive capacity of the area is one-third greater than it was in 1913.

The Clyde, too, builds a greater variety of ships than any other part of the world, and has therefore unique opportunities of exploiting new ideas in marine engineering. At present important experiments are progressing with double-acting types of Diesel engines, and excellent results in cheap running are expected from a particular combination of internal combustion and steam engine. The attention of some marine manufacturers has been directed to profitable side-lines—automobiles, locomotives, aeroplanes and constructional steel.

Much of the credit for placing Glasgow in the van of modern progress is due to the genius of Lord Kelvin, who did his greatest work in the city. He came first under notice for his part in the laying of the Atlantic telegraph cable. Then followed his work in engineering theory and practice, and his phenomenal discoveries in the utilisation of electricity. In June of this year Glasgow celebrates with fitting homage the centenary of his birth.

In constructional matters, mention may be made of the great bridge-builder, the late Sir William Arrol. The Glasgow firm which he founded and directed revolutionized the science of bridge-building, and he has left as examples of his skill the Forth Bridge (Scotland), the Tower Bridge (London), and many others throughout Britain and Egypt.

One-half of the population of Scotland live within 20 miles of Glasgow's Exchange and do their buying of imported and luxury articles in the city.

The Glasgow census of 1921 shows that 100,000 tradesmen are metal workers—machine-makers, boilermakers, riveters, etc. Textiles keep 40,000 busy, wood-work 23,000, paper-making and printing 11,000, the making of food, drink and tobacco, 15,000, with thousands of electrical engineers, painters and confectioners.

Exclusive of 40,000 clerks there are 54,000 people engaged in commercial occupations and as many more in transport and communications.

The trade in raw materials and food stuffs for the West of Scotland and the North of England and the export of coal and finished products give the river plenty of work. Every year the Clyde Navigation Trustees take 2,000,000 tons of silt from the river bottom and deposit it in the firth to make way for traffic which last year amounted, inwards and outwards, to 26,241 vessels of 12,823,195 tons, carrying 8,042,000 tons of goods.

Last year's imports of goods to Glasgow, in tons, included: corn and flour, nearly 500,000; ore, 571,000; fruits, 116,342; timber, 44,000; sugar, 30,705.

For loading and discharge the most up-to-date equipment is provided at many docks which give 20,000 yards of quay wall and a water area of over 325 acres. The harbor's normal revenue is over £1,000,000. a year.

But the harbor authorities, anticipating days of greater prosperity are prepared to build a series of basins with a two-mile frontage on the river between Glasgow and Renfrew to accommodate the largest liner using the port. This provision will double existing harbor facilities. The work of the first basin is now being put in hand.

Glasgow is spreading rapidly into the country. Great boulevards are continually pushing forward among suburban cottages. These people find expression for their views and are provided with a first-class news and advertising service by the local press. A commanding position among British morning newspapers is held by the Glasgow Herald. One of the oldest papers in the United Kingdom—it is now in its 142d year—it enjoys an enviable reputation for accuracy, authoritativeness and influential circulation. The city is rivalled only by London in the quality and number of its evening papers.

Last week the Clinton (Ia.) Herald paid its respects to its veteran advertiser, C. E. Armstrong & Sons, calling attention to the fact that June 7 was the 54th anniversary of the first advertising of the firm in the Herald.

IRISH FREE STATE RENEWS PROSPERITY

THE Irish Free State today is rapidly making up for time lost in the somewhat unsettled conditions of a year or two ago. Her individuality as an integral State is, under the hands of her present statesmen, in process of firm establishment.

One of the means by which this has been brought to achievement was the encouragement of ancient Irish ideas and traditions to make the State Irish in the Irish sense. The language was first the care of the revivalists. The Gaelic League was founded to preserve and propagate it, and so thorough has been its work, that the speech which 20 years ago was only heard on the lips of peasants and fisherfolk on the Atlantic border, is now spoken familiarly by thousands of people in all parts, is a compulsory subject in all schools and in the National University, and has received a tremendous impetus from the establishment of a National Government.

Unable, at the time, for lack of a native legislature, to protect their industries by enactment, the people decided voluntarily to give preference to home-grown and home-manufactured products. A national trade-mark was devised to distinguish these, and in the short period during which it has been in use there has been a marked increase of the commodities entitled to bear it.

Along with the revival of language and industry came a revival of the national sports and dances, and a sudden outpouring of literature in both the Irish and English languages, so that when the century was ten years old, and yet another political movement was making a last effort to obtain self-government, the nation had shaken off its lethargy and was looking to the future with renewed hopes and ambitions.

With the peace secured by the Treaty, the Irish Free State began to settle down to the development of its business. Not that the country had become poverty-stricken by any neglect of these interests, for proven facts furnished by official reports indicate only too clearly its financial strength and stability. Indeed, in this matter, the Irish Free State compares favorably with the most blessed of all countries.

The exports of the Irish Free State are in themselves proof of the stability. Ireland's figures stand high in the columns of the great countries; in 1921, the last year for which figures are available, farm produce, food and drink stuffs, exported amounted to £74,000,000; textiles, £35,000,000, and ships over £10,000,000.

The Irish poultry industry is indicative of the manner in which money circulates through all classes, for while in 1904 the value of the export trade in eggs, poultry, and feathers was about £2,750,000, in 1921 it considerably exceeded £11,000,000. In other words, in less than 20 years an industry regarded as a "pin money" affair for the farmer's wife has become a great national income.

For many centuries Ireland has been renowned throughout Europe for the quality of her woolen products. Every county in the Irish Free State possesses factories engaged in the production of woolen textiles of various kinds, such as ladies' and gentlemen's suitings, tweeds, cheviots, flannels, homespuns, friezes, blankets, traveling rugs and shawls. These goods are produced in a great variety of designs and are, almost exclusively, manufactured from pure wool. The following figures show the quantity of such goods exported from Irish Free State ports in the years 1921 and 1922,

	Cwts
Woolen goods	13,534
Apparel, unclassified	9,887
Blankets	2,759

The home demand for the foregoing absorbs, by far, the greater proportion of the country's production, but Irish woolen manufacturers are planning to extend their export trade, which, when foreign exchanges become more settled, should show considerable increase over that of previous years.

The Irish Free State produces, annually, large quantities of raw wool. Whilst an amount of this is worked up in Irish woolen mills, chiefly in the production of blankets, flannels, friezes and homespuns, the amount exported is considerable. In 1921, 4,816,896 lbs. were exported, whereas in 1922 the figure increased to 16,521,344 lbs.

Another Irish industry which has made rapid headway in recent years is the manufacture of hosiery. Factories in the Irish Free State produce the highest quality woolen hosiery, and find no difficulty in competing in the home market against the best products of other countries. The export trade in these goods is now receiving the attention it deserves. In 1921, the amount exported totalled 934 cwts.; in 1922, it increased to 1,109 cwts., and there is every reason to believe that Irish manufacturers of these goods will discover larger markets for their products overseas with each succeeding year.

PRESIDENT OF IRISH FREE STATE ON "GREATER UNDERSTANDING"

By W. T. COSGRAVE

President Irish Free State

Written for EDITOR & PUBLISHER

I AM glad to learn that citizens of the Irish Free State will participate in the World's Advertising Congress. Not only will the discussions benefit business men directly interested, but the international character of the Congress should lead to greater friendliness and understanding between the peoples represented. Many of the difficulties which arise between nations are due to misunderstanding and distrust, due in no small degree to lack of knowledge, and anything which tends to promote international knowledge is a boon to mankind. Many delegates, especially among those from beyond the Seas, will be interested in the progress of the Irish Free State. Our institutions are in their early stages, and time must yet pass before the full fruits of self-government will be realized. The foundations have been laid for the building of a democratic and progressive state.

U. S. HOUSES SUCCEED BY MAIL IN BRITAIN

comparatively few years ago and started with a very small appropriation upon at first a purely mail order basis. Gradually as the mail order business grew, he commenced to build up a trade distribution and now he has something like a 60 per cent distribution among the 11,000 odd chemists in the country. Without the benefit of his mail-order advertising and the immediate profits he derived from it, to attain such a distribution would have called for either a large initial expenditure or long uphill work.

Another case where mail order advertising was used to build up trade distribution and continued concurrently with it is that of the West Electric Hair Curler Company of Philadelphia. When this company started over here during our post war slump in the teeth of the most formidable competition, the wiseacres shook their heads and felt they were embarking on a hopeless task. But once again America confounded the critics. Starting with trial advertisements in the Daily Mirror and Daily Sketch, the mail order results were so good that and now in just three years you can get West Electrics wherever you go in England as easily as you can get them in America where they have been advertised for ten years or more.

West Electrics afford a good example of the use of mail order advertising for getting a line on the possibilities of a foreign market. They consulted us about a certain foreign country they were thinking of attacking because they were not sure firstly how strongly West Electrics would appeal to the women of that country nor secondly how much the price they would be compelled to charge by the depreciated exchange would militate against the chances of success. Upon these points depended the very important question of policy as to whether they should appoint an agent or start their own branch.

It was decided to try some mail order advertising direct from the London office before deciding. This was not with a view to making any profit, because to get money sent by foreign women to an address in London is naturally difficult—though we have at least one client who is doing it successfully—but rather to see what interest was shown. We advised two papers which our experience had proved to be good mail order media at a total cost of about $100 and the results exceeded even our expectations. Not only did they bring literally hundreds of orders—more than enough to show a profit—but they proved conclusively that even the depreciated currency was not going to prevent them from having as big a market as they have in Great Britain.

Incidentally the currency stood so low that they had to charge approximately five times the nominal pre-war equivalent of the present British price.

Another case where we are following the same plan of using mail order advertising in the early stages is that of a high grade proprietary medicine with a particularly strong and scientific backing.

Here we were faced with the problem of making a comparatively small appropriation produce sufficient results to pay the cost of gradual expansion. It was a quite suitable proposition for mail order advertising and now for nearly a year mail order advertising has carried the business on while the profits from it have been devoted to building up a trade distribution which is just beginning to prove fruitful.

One reason why some such method of producing results in the early stages of a new proposition is often essential is that it is exceedingly difficult to run an efficient local advertising campaign in Great Britain.

We have practically none of those typical American small towns where experimental campaigns can so easily be run, towns of 50,000 population and upwards a hundred miles or so from any other town, covered by a live evening paper and served by perhaps two jobbers in each trade. In such towns you can run a local campaign and know first that your advertising is not only really covering the town, but that none of it is being wasted, and second, that your check on sales is equally efficient.

In England this is not the case. There is no town of that size that the London daily does not reach in quite fair quantity, so that you cannot be sure the local paper is really covering the ground, while—more important still—it is always impossible to learn where the supplies the jobber buys actually go to, so that a direct comparison of sales and advertising expenditure is quite out of the question, unless the appropriation is sufficient for a real national campaign.

I do not mean to suggest that it is only by mail order advertising that early success can be achieved. This would be absurd and there have been many striking examples of rapid successes by other methods with small expenditures. A very good one is that of an article called Harpic. In its functions this is somewhat similar to the well known American product Saniflush. Harpic was first put on the market about four years ago by an enterprising young Yorkshireman who started with a small office, five employees and very little capital. Within three years he had sold 4,000,000 tins of his product. In fifteen months he had 5,000 dealers stocking Harpic. In another five months this figure had grown to 18,000. This success was due of course partly to the fact that his product really filled a need but very largely to his efficient sales methods and only partly to advertising which was mostly strong, small space advertising in a list of media that was pretty well as wide as his resources allowed.

This case is of especial interest to Americans because it illustrates quite forcibly the opportunities that are awaiting in the British market for literally scores of American lines.

EDINBURGH—CAPITAL OF SCOTLAND

annum. To Edinburgh belongs the honor in Great Britain of instituting the degree of Commerce.

No provincial city in the United Kingdom has more head offices of banks than Edinburgh, and of branch banks there are no fewer than 100. As regards insurance, there are nearly 60 different offices in the city employing about 1,400 persons. Fifteen companies, some of them over 100 years old, have their headquarters in Edinburgh, and these, with assets aggregating well over £100,000,000, have command of large sums for investment. It is not generally known that more income tax is paid in Edinburgh than in Glasgow, Scotland's most populous centre.

Brewing is one of the largest industries of the city, and the quality of Edinburgh-made ales is known in all parts of the civilized world. While the success of the brewing industry is a testimony to Scottish ability and commercial enterprise, it would have been impossible to have attained the results achieved without the abundant and excellent supplies of water obtainable from wells in the City.

Edinburgh is the Burton of Scotland, and produces 70 per cent of the whole of the beer brewed in Scotland. The total capital invested directly in the local breweries is between five and six million pounds. The combined breweries provide employment for thousands and indirectly support numerous subsidiary concerns and their employes; in addition, their demands for barley make Edinburgh a flourishing grain market.

Scotland is essentially the home of distilling, and the two largest distilleries are situated in Edinburgh. The capital employed is between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000, and the output about 5,000,000 gallons per annum. Brewing and distilling together give employment to about 4,000 persons.

It is impossible in a short article even to catalog all the trades that have made Edinburgh famous, but it may be mentioned that the city is one of the largest rubber manufacturing centres of the country, one company alone giving employment to 4,500 persons; and that in the scientific industry associated with pharmaceutical chemistry Edinburgh leads the world, supplying enormously to the United States and even to so highly scientific a country as Germany.

costs is still the most important factor.

Those who take our national humor too seriously may be surprised to learn that this is a particularly important point in dealing with the Scottish buyer. The Scot does not demand cheapness. But he will have value for his money.

To the average Britisher, buying a car is a matter for grave consideration. He does not buy to sell again next year. He is spending as much money as he used to pay for a house.

Official road and track tests carried out by the motorists' organizations afford him opportunity to make a selection, as does also the annual motor exhibition held at Olympia, London, in November every year. The occasion of one of the big races or of the show is always the signal for a great increase in the amount of motor advertising. Some firms make a policy of regularly competing in the trials; and their advertisements are practically result-bulletins. This is the case with many light cars of sporting type and such a policy undoubtedly reaches the right class of buyer for this class of car. The selling points which trial results illustrate in the most graphic fashion are speed and, even more important, reliability and running economy.

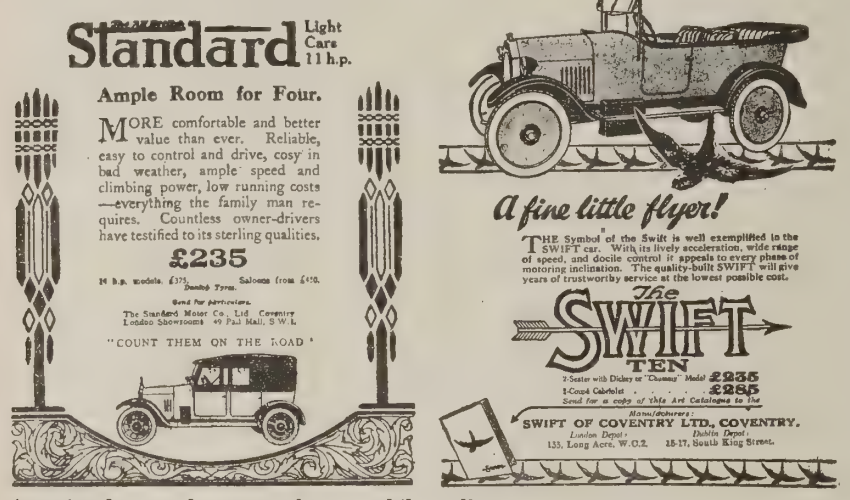
Many manufacturers do not compete in trials, except occasionally in road reliability tests and their advertising—the most interesting part from the advertising man's point-of view—aims at driving home the advantages of motoring and particularly the advantages of the use of their own productions. An example of this class of advertisement, appealing to the family man, is seen in the "Standard" advertisement reproduced here.

The British advertiser is paying more and more attention to layout and to the importance of getting his display just right and I should be the last to deny that in this manner he has had many fine examples set by his American competitors who have laid siege to the English market during the last few years.

It is my experience that for every dozen artists who can draw live people in every other kind of surroundings there is only one who can convey an impression of real people in a real car. Motor advertising art today is also making greater calls on the engraver than ever before. While we still have with us the manufacturer who crams in a catalog halftone and fills up his space with detailed specifications, the greater part of the advertising pages of our motor press is as interesting as the editorial columns.

One point in the "copy" used in motor advertising in this country that would probably strike an American copy-writer is that much of it, particularly in the non-technical press, is of a general nature and dwells upon the advantages of the possession of a car and the joys of motoring. This is accounted for by the fact that in Great Britain these advantages cannot be "taken as read."

The Englishman may not have lost his traditional love of the sea; but neither has he developed any inborn aptitude for the steering wheel. The fact that the total number of private cars in England is still less than 500,000 and that only one Englishman in a hundred is a car-owner as compared with one American in every nine is sufficient justification for the English copy-writer's dictum that you must sell the idea of car-ownership before you can sell any particular car.



One other peculiarity of British car advertising "copy" is that in this field the testimonial type of copy still proves undoubtedly effective. Possibly the reason for this is that the average motor owner talks motors in and out of season and actually does send to its makers long and detailed reports of the performance of his new car. Provided, therefore, that your production is of any merit, there is never a lack of real testimony available for advertising purposes.

One cannot discuss advertising for long without being reminded that the one test of excellence is results. Judged on this basis, English car advertising, as a whole, has given a good account of itself. After the boom that immediately followed the war had collapsed, the trade, in common with the others, suffered from continued depression. Today one of the brightest spots in British industry is the motor trade. Conventry, Birmingham, Wolverhampton are working at full strength; the makers of one popular medium-priced car have re-introduced the waiting list; and there is a splendid demand for every car which offers real value for money.

Advertising motor cars is an art unto itself. It presents many problems which do not occur in other trades. It is particularly true of car advertising that it is as important to know what to leave out as what to put in. One reason for the high standard of car advertisement design is that most of it is handled by advertising agencies and a large proportion by specialized agencies dealing particularly with engineering and motoring propositions.

In conclusion it may be said that motor advertising in England is entering on a fresh stage: that—economic conditions permitting—the wider use of the daily press, with "Make More Motorists" as its object, will soon effect an alteration in the percentage of inhabitants owning cars.

No class of manufacturers are as a body so "sold" on the effectiveness of advertising as the motor car builders of this country. Everything points to an increase in the volume of car advertising. There are still thousands of men in England who can afford a car and have not got one.

America knows this type of automobile well. U. S. readers, however, miss the picnic party, or the football-bound family usually pictured descending with the thought of a pleasant ride shining on all their faces.

Céad Míle Fáilte

A HUNDRED thousand welcomes!

How aptly the fine old Gaelic phrase expresses the spirit of Irish hospitality! Céad Míle Fáilte. To our friends and comrades in advertising, we and our whole country, extend our arms in welcome. Céad Míle Fáilte!

THE services of this organization are at the disposal of American firms interested in the Irish market. On request we will make a careful investigation and will tell you frankly what field exists in Ireland for your product.

This Agency has helped to establish the products of scores of manufacturers firmly in the Irish market. Its services are based on the accumulated knowledge of 20 years' selling and advertising in Ireland.

Conditions in Ireland differ from those in Great Britain. Since the inauguration of the Free State they are changing more constantly than ever. To advertise successfully in Ireland demands close contact with Irish affairs. This Agency gives you that contact. It ensures the Irish viewpoint in your advertising. Seeing your goods as Irish consumers see them, we can avoid the uncertainty and speculative elements inevitable in a campaign planned and executed from outside the country.

CHARM OF CENTURIES-OLD GATE

West Gate, Southampton, remnant of a past age.

Not to blow our Own Trumpet

WE did not take this space to blow our own trumpet, but to send a hearty greeting across the Atlantic to the American delegation.

To Ireland the American nation has always been as a big brother among the powers and we hope Americans will not be so busy at the convention as to forget their little friend next door. That small friend is growing fast—Ireland today is growing peaceful and prosperous and you may take it as settled that we are buying ploughshares instead of swords.

You have heard of Irish hospitality and we want to show you what a real old Irish Welcome is like. Do not pay too much attention to all you hear about "The nation of impractical dreamers". When you get here you will find shrewd business men and good sportsmen in plenty, but very few dreamers.

American advertising men visiting the Emerald Isle are assured of "cead mille failté" at Publicity House.

GOVERNOR

To the Members of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World,
In Convention,
London, England.

Greetings:

As Governor of Texas, and as a staunch believer in the possibilities of the Lone Star State, I take this means of extending to you, personally and officially, a most cordial invitation to come to Texas and Houston for the 1925 Convention of your great organization. Not only the people of Houston, but the five million citizens of this State covet an opportunity to extend to you the hospitality for which they are justly famed.

Houston is a metropolis with a broad vision. With its deep waterway, and with ocean-going liners discharging their cargoes from the many ports of the world, Houston stands ready to take first place among Southern cities. Few, if any cities in all the United States, are better equipped to handle such a Convention as yours. Houston has ample hotel accommodations, as well as transportation lines; many good, clean amusement places, and adjacent historic spots.

I should have been very glad indeed, had it been my privilege to come before you personally and extend this invitation to hold your 1925 Convention in Texas. Unforeseen matters have denied me that pleasure; however, I hope that it will be my privilege to meet with you in Houston in 1925, and to extend to you a welcome to our State.

Cordially yours,

Governor of Texas

FLAGS OF 6 NATIONS HAVE FLOWN OVER TEXAS

History of State Dates Back to French Occupation in 1684—Passed to Spain, Then Mexico—Became a Republic, Joined U. S., Later Seceding with Confederacy

UNDER the French Flag 1684 to 1690.
Under the Spanish Flag 1690 to 1821.
Under the Mexican Flag 1821 to 1836.
Under Republic of Texas Flag 1836 to 1846.
Under United States Flag 1846 to 1861.
Under Confederate States of America Flag 1861 to 1865.
Under United States Flag 1865 to present time.

Such, in brief, is a summary of the various governments under which Texas, largest state in the Union, has been ruled.

No similar area can look back upon more vicissitudes; no similar area can look forward to such a great future as can Texas.

The first flag raised by white men on Texas soil was the result of a mistake, made by Robert Cavalier Sieur de la Salle, who was the first white man to sail down the Mississippi River, and who returned to France to get the king to permit him to colonize what is now New Orleans, promising that it would be the largest city in America.

When he left the mouth of the Mississippi River he took the latitude, but neglected to take the longtitude and, when he sailed from Rochelle, France, on July 24, 1684, with 4 vessels and 300 people he got off the true path and landed in the Bay of San Bernard, now Matagorda Bay, in Texas, where he planted the flag of the King of France, built Fort St. Louis on the LaVaca River, and set out to find the mouth of the Mississippi River, a feat he failed to accomplish, being killed by his own people, who, leaderless, made a failure of the expedition.

When Spain heard of this there arose a dispute, Spain claiming a prior right to this territory, basing that claim on the obvious fact that Texas was a part of America, and America being discovered by Columbus, sailing under the Spanish flag, was the property of Spain.

In addition to this it was noted that Desoto entered Texas in 1542, and in 1582 Espejo made halts at El Paso and Santa Fe.

The King of France, however, could not get this angle of the matter and, in 1712 made a grant of Louisiana and all lands to the Rio Grande River to Anthony Crozot, who started opening trade with Mexico through Texas, and Spain proceeded to build a chain of Missions from the Rio Grande to Sabine.

In 1690, however, Texas came under Spanish domination.

Spain worried along with Texas, considering it a part of Mexico, until, in 1810, Mexico, under the leadership of a patriot priest, Hidalgo by name, rebelled against Spanish rule, starting a revolution which dragged along until 1821, when independence was won.

In 1819 the United States, having laid more or less claim to that part of the country north of the Rio Grande River, gave up all claims on Texas in exchange for buying Florida from Spain.

Upon being freed from the Spanish yoke Mexico formed a monarchy, and General Iturbide was made its first Emperor. His rule, however, was scarcely less oppressive than that of the King of Spain, and another revolution unseated him, and Mexico was declared a Republic in 1824.

It took but 2 years for Texas to decide that Mexican rule was not all that was to be desired. A revolution was started, but it accomplished nothing. Another revolution, organized in 1833, dragged along until, on April 21, 1836, General Sam Houston met and defeated General Santa Anna, the President of Mexico, who, in personal command of his troops, had been conducting a campaign of white man extermination.

This made Texas a republic in its own right.

For 10 years Texas made more or less headway as a republic, but it was a white man's republic, ruled by English speaking Americans, and after 10 years, being invited to join the United States, did so, remaining under the Stars and Stripes for 15 years, until the outbreak of the Civil War. Then Texas joined the Confederate States of America, rejoining the Union with the other Confederate states at the close of the war.

Just as the Spanish eventually dominated the Indians and French, and ruled Texas, so the American pioneer, fighting his way, inch by inch, finally dominated the Spaniards and drove them from the country.

In the driving, however, it was a man's work, every bit of it, and, in the carving of this state from wilderness, many great men have performed many great and glorious deeds of mighty valor; have made history, have made tradition and have, in the making of these, made a great state.

One of the outstanding spots in Texas history is the story of the Alamo.

Going back of the massacre, it is well to note that, in 1819, Doctor James Long, with 300 people, started from Natchez, Miss., to colonize Texas, and they helped form the first attempted Republic at Nacogdoches.

Then, too, Jean Lafitte, a French smuggler and buccaneer, after years of piracy on the high seas, established himself and his band on the island of Galvez, in 1816, from which he proceeded to annoy Spanish ships, but kept his hands off ships sailing other than Spanish flags.

Eventually, however, he got to interfering with American ships, and was ordered off the island, whereupon he disbanded his followers and with one ship, went to Yucatan, where he lived until his death in 1826.

Moses Austin, who settled in Missouri when that was Spanish territory, took a colony of 300 Missourians to Texas to settle, but died shortly after, and was succeeded as head of the colony by his son, Stephen F. Austin, who was afterwards known as the father of Texas. The first settlement was made on the Brazos river.

When Mexico gained freedom from Spanish rule the new government offered inducements to people from the United States to colonize this territory, and by 1835 there were between 25,000 and 30,000 Americans living in Texas.

This, perhaps, is one of the greatest reasons why Texas revolted against Mexican rule, and is, without question, why the war was concluded successfully for the Texans.

In the year 1700 the Mission of San Francisco Salono was founded on the Rio Grande River, but in 1718 Martin de Alcon, Governor of Coahulia, founded the town of San Antonio, and the Mission was moved there and re-christened the Alamo, and as the Alamo it thrived as a Mission for more than 115 years.

When Texas rebelled against Mexico in 1835 the Mexican army came into the state to subdue the rebellion. In the battle of Gonzales 1,000 Mexicans were defeated by 500 Texans, and in March, 1836, the Alamo was turned into a fort by a band of less than 150 Texans who were trapped there by the Mexican army of more than 8,000 under the personal command of President General Santa Anna.

These Texans were fighters and died to a man, being slaughtered like so many sheep, none living to tell the tale. This was on March 6.

The tragedy at the Alamo so roused the Texans that they rallied to the flag, and on the following month, under the command of General Sam Houston, defeated the Mexicans at the battle of San Jacinto, fought near the present city of

MAYOR O. F. HOLCOMBE

To Members of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World,
London, England:

AS the Mayor of Houston and a staunch believer in the wonderful advantages and possibilities of the city, I take this means of extending the hospitality of Houston for the 1925 convention to your great organization.

Houston is a city with a broad vision. With its deep waterway accommodating ocean-going liners from the ports of the world, the city stands ready to take its place as a leading metropolis of the South.

Few, if any, cities of the United States are better qualified, in my opinion, to handle such a convention as yours. Houston has adequate hotel accommodations and magnificent transportation facilities and many varieties of good, clean amusements.

From a selfish point of view, there is no organization that we would rather see meet in Houston than the Advertising Men's Association. The organization is made up of men of unusual ability, prominent in their communities, and it would be a real pleasure to show them the many things of which Houston is proud.

There are hundreds of industries in and about Houston that the members will find well worth visiting and we can guarantee the association every facility needed to make the convention a complete success, both from a business and a social point of view.

I am merely expressing the sentiment of every citizen of Houston when I say that we will consider it a pleasure and privilege to entertain the advertising men in 1925.

O. F. HOLCOMBE, Mayor of Houston.

TEXANS UNDER ANOTHER FLAG—IT'S A HABIT

These Texans, by courteously deferring to London in 1924, captured a British flag from the Thirty Club of London and made a total of seven flags for Texas. The flag was "surrendered" by the Thirty Club at a banquet, signalizing a fightless victory. Reading from left to right, are: R. M. Cornell, George Mistrot, M. C. Howard, W. S. Patton (President), George B. Forristall (Color Bearer), George S. Cohen, John Payne and Dale C. Rogers.

Houston, and, capturing Santa Anna, ended the war and gained independence.

When, on July 4, 1845, the Texas Legislature ratified the annexation to the United States they further engendered bad blood with Mexico, and brought on the Mexican war of 1848.

It seems that Texas was foreordained to be a part of the United States, although both the French and Spanish peoples opposed such an idea.

No new country is ever settled by mollycoddles, and the pioneers of Texas were hardy people recruited from the venturesome citizens of the United States, the born pioneers, who, seemingly, spurned all civilization and civilizing influences, and pushed their way ever westward, intent upon opening up new territory.

This characteristic was a dominant one in Texas for many years, and is, perhaps, why the state, with many disadvantages to overcome, has gone ahead as it has, and developed into the powerful state it now is.

As to territory Texas, with its 265,896 square miles, has more territory than have the states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia combined.

This vast territory affords all kinds of climate—mountains, plains, seacoast—everything.

Part of the state is timbered, and furnishes a quantity of lumber. The fame of Texas, however, particularly in its earlier days, rests upon the vast cattle ranges which gave the state its first prosperity. Lumber was another of the earlier industries that produced wealth, and, as land was cleared, as water was brought to the land, and controlled, as fences were built, agriculture flourished abundantly.

Later oil was discovered and the oil fields of Texas have yielded great fortunes and are still producing great quantities of oil.

In the Southern part of the state the growth of citrus fruit has made wonderful strides, and is now far past the experimental stage. The fruits grown in Texas rival those grown anywhere, not only in abundance but in sweetness and delicacy of flavor.

Texas has more miles of railroad track than has any other state in the Union, and its ports are ports of real importance.

Song and story have told the outside world of the earlier romances of Texas; have painted pictures which at the time they were painted, were true but which today are outmoded.

It would be as foolish for the visitor to Texas to look for the long haired, gun-toting "westerner" of tradition as it would be for the man who first visits London to expect to find the "typical" Briton of the days of Richard Coeur de Lion.

Texas, as it stands today, is absolutely modern. More so, in fact, than many of the older parts of the country, for Texas is ALL new, with the exception of a few—a very few old "Shrines" which are preserved to link the past with the present.

In most of the countries there are "shrines" and then, too, there are "eye sores" which remain, not for any historical value, but simply because they do not fall down.

Not so in Texas. Texas cities are building, and in building they are tearing down the old structures. There are no "hallowed spots" of antiquity to be preserved, except a few public buildings and churches.

The new generation of Texans, retaining all the daring and manliness of their ancestors, have added the refinement and polish obtained by eastern travel and schooling. As this is being written, in the year 1924, merchants and manufacturers everywhere, who are acquainted with conditions prevailing over the civilized world, agree that Texas is one of the best states anywhere, one of the liveliest markets, and a state that, great as it is, has just begun to grow into a destiny that is going to reach tremendous proportions in a very few years.

Some history has been made in Texas. A great deal more history—business history—is to be made in Texas in the next few decades.

TEXAS CITY'S INSTITUTIONS LAST WORD IN MODERN PROGRESS

By HON. MORRIS SHEPPARD
United States Senator from Texas

THE Associated Advertising Clubs of the World could find no place more appropriate for their next annual convention than Houston, Tex. This city is dawning rapidly upon the world as one of the most promising centers of commerce and culture. Its ship channel, connecting it with world markets, is a marvel of civic enterprise and vision, while its railroads, banks, hotels, institutions of learning and benevolence are the last word in modern progress. Come to Houston, and enjoy a genuine Houstonian, Texan welcome.

"WE CAME, WE SAW AND BOTH CONQUERED"

Forristall Recounts the Romantic Story of the Presentation of the Union Jack to Houston's Delegation at Atlantic City—This Year Stars and Stripes Will Journey with the British Banner

By GEORGE B. FORRISTALL, Sales Manager Foley Bros. Dry Goods Co., and JOHN H. PAYNE, Business Manager, The Houston Press

THIRTY men, good and true Texans, in June 1923 set out from Houston, Texas, to cross swords with our worthy visitors from Old England at Atlantic City. In this little body of Houstonians were representatives of the principel advertising and civic interests of Houston. On the way to Atlantic City, we gathered at Dallas with other Texans and by the time the party rolled into Atlantic City on that sunny Sunday afternoon the Texas party numbered nearly 100, everyone ready and willing to do his share for Houston, in an effort to win the 1924 convention of the A. A. C. of W. for Houston.

Five days later the little delegation from the Southland rolled back towards home defeated in a way but with the colors of victory still waving, for in defeat Houston was bigger than if it had won. Back of this whole affair is a genuine story that has been told in Houston, but which is probably not well known by the advertisnig interests of the world.

On the way to Atlantic City the Texas delegation made such preliminary plans as were possible. Rolling into the resort city of the Atlantic seaboard, every man appeared attired in typical resort attire, blue coat, white flannels and straw hat and to bring vividly to the attention of those in attendance each man wore a bright green necktie and green hat band and a big red, white and blue Texas star. True it was a violent color combination, but it made Houston stand out in the multitude.

One member of the Houston party traveled to Atlantic City in the baggage car, for the railroads would not transport him as a Pullman passenger. That was the famous Red Rooster that stopped traffic on the Boardwalk on Sunday afternoon and which was the official delegate of Houston's fun lovers, the Red Roosters.

The arrival of the Houston delegation was officially announced to our English friends by a magnificent basket of American Beauty roses sent to Sir John Cheshire, head of the English Delegation.

Monday morning, when the business sessions of the convention opened on the Steel Pier, a bevy of Southern Beauties took possession of the entrance to the Pier and with sweet Cape Jasmine buds captured every person in attedance at that session.

As each person arrived at the pier one of these charming young ladies immediately pinned upon his or her lapel a pink ribbon with the slogan "Houston next" and a Cape Jasmine bud. Some of our English friends had to be persuaded to don the fragrant flowers and the Houston badge, in many cases only by the promise that the Houston folks would wear a London badge.

Our dear friend John Cheshire by a clever move rather foreshadowed the events to come by writing in heavy black pencil at the top of his Houston badge, the words "London 1924" and after the printed slogan "Houston Next" the figures "1925." That was the sign for all the Britishers to do likewise and Houston's first brush with the enemy was marked with defeat, but a graceful one at that.

At the close of the Monday morning session, John Cheshire, J. Murray Allison and C. Harold Vernon accompanied by our old friend and relative of the founder of Houston, Herbert Houston paid an official call upon the Houston Convention Executive Committee at our rooms in the tower of the Marlborough Blenheim. A pleasant chat was had and all members of the Houston delegation were greatly pleased to have their British brothers call on them. This call was repaid in the afternoon at the Ambassador Hotel. While the contest up to this time was strong, every bit of it was marked by the highest degree of fair play and sportsmanship.

Houston's fight for the convention was kept up to the last ditch. Every man did his bit. Someone spread the rumor that Houston was just laying down a barrage and had no real idea of the convention coming to Texas in 1924. To offset this rumor that traveled so rapidly through the convention, members of the Texas delegation were dispatched to all departmental sessions to say a few words to offset the rumor .

Houston's publicity manager, in the meantime had made his headquarters in the press room at the Marlborough Blenheim and was putting out story after story. Houston was being advertised to the world, filling columns on the front pages of the Eastern papers.

The Houston Executive Committee went without sleep. On the last night prior to the President's Dinner, at which the 1924 Convention City was to be nominated, the entire executive committee went into session at 11 o'clock and did not retire until after five the next morning. Fight was the word, but an honest straightforward fight to a finish.

Now for the big night when all was to be settled. Houston's fight was carried through to the end.

In fact Houston's convention executive committee was late in reaching dinner. Some wondered if it would ever reach a decision in time to attend at all. The committee of six was evenly divided. The motive which actuated the committee was—How could Houston best serve the advertising interests of the world? Part thought this could best be done by holding the convention in Houston and in this manner show a portion of the United States never seen by most of the delegates. Acquaint them with natural resources in Texas never dreamed of. The other part of the committee had become converted to the big idea and broad vision of the British delegation that the advertising interest would be best served by holding the convention in London—that the business interests of the world might get better acquainted and afford a better universal understanding. It was John Cheshire's gentle, earnest, courteous presentation ably backed up his colleagues that had sold half of the committee the larger vision and the postponement of our ambition.

The time for the President's dinner had come and still the committee was deadlocked. Suddenly the door was flung open and in lock step came "Tex" Bayless, Lawrence Ruthford and Wallace O'Leary. In unison they said "We're for you in whatever you do—but, give it to London for 1924 and let's have them come to us in 1925." Another vote was taken and London had won in our own committee.

Without change of clothing and in more or less dishevelment we rushed over to the President's dinner already well on its way. Not a word was said as to the committee's final decision. Presently President Lou Holland announced the time had come to select the Convention City for 1924 and he presented John Cheshire, the leader of the British delegation. He was followed by C. Harold Vernon, W. S. Crawford, and E. T. Meredith, presenting London's claims.

Then turning to the Houston delegation Lou Holland said, "Another city is after the 1924 convention, and they have come from almost as great a distance as has London. We will listen to Houston's claims," and he presented John H. Payne who seriously and earnestly presented the reasons why the 1924 convention should go to Houston. Harry C. Howard, President of the Houston Club, was next introduced. He explained that Houston was anxious to serve the advertising clubs of the world. The question was how it could best be done. Then pausing for a few seconds he dramatically seconded for the 1924 convention, London, England.

For seconds not a sound was heard. To the Houston delegation it seemed minutes, then pandemonium broke loose. Several of our London friends broke down and wept tears of joy. Englishmen who ordinarily are not emotionally demonstrative cheered and in every way demonstrated their delight.

The last part of the convention and the one that will ever remain in the minds of those who attended this great convention took place on Wednesday night. At the close of the president's dinner Tuesday night C. Harold Vernon and J. Murray Allison called at the Houston headquarters at midnight with an invitation to the Houston and Texas delegation to meet with the Englishmen for dinner in the grill of the Ambassador on Wednesday evening.

The entire personnel of both English and Texas delegations assembled in the Ambassador lobby and side by side filed down through the corridors to the beautiful grill where still side by side a wonderful dinner was served. Gracing the head of the table were Sir John Cheshire, Lou Holland, President of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, and a number of other notables of the convention.

At the close of the dinner, our wonderful friend and host, after a number of beautiful speeches, presented to the Houston delegation that which the Britisher holds dearest to him, a magnificent silken Union Jack, which was received for Houston by President Howard of the Houston Advertising Association.

Only one more chapter of the story remains to be told. Houston wants the Advertising Clubs of the World to meet in Texas. The Britishers came to Atlantic City 115 strong. They have promised to come to Houston in 1925 300 to 500 strong and direct from England to Houston, Texas, by water. We will meet them right at our own waterfront when they arrive—and then both London and Houston will have won.

HOUSTON—PORT AND METROPOLIS—OFFERS UNLIMITED HOSPITALITY TO A.A.C.W.

By HON. EARLE B. MAYFIELD
United States Senator from Texas

HOUSTON, with its ship channel to the Gulf of Mexico and the railroad facilities of an inland metropolis is unique among the cities of the United States. As a place for the 1925 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World it presents claims hard to disregard. If the advertising men of the world decide to come to Houston in 1925, they will receive a welcome they will not soon forget and a liberal education in the meaning of the Great Southwest.

TO HOLD "SEND-OFF" DINNER

A.A.C.W. Delegates to Be Entertained by N. Y. Ad Club June 26

On-to-Britain delegates will be entertained at a "send-off" dinner to be held June 26 at the Advertising Club of New York, according to an announcement made last week by the club's On-to-London committee.

The following honor guests have been invited: F. A. Thompson, commissioner of the United States Shipping Board; E. T. Meredith, former A. A. C. W. president; Edward Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railroad; Sir Harry Armstrong, British Consul; Mayor John F. Hylan; Commissioner Barron G. Collier; Hon. Grover A. Whalen, and Hon. Rodman T. Wanamaker.

GROWN-UP TEXAS LIKES BOYHOOD SPORTS

State Where "Distance" Takes on New Meanings Knows the Range and Vaqueros Only in the Movies, But Keeps Alive the Hearty Fellowship of the "Old Days"

By HARRY R. DRUMMOND

OF COURSE Texas is one of the 48 varieties, just as is Rhode Island, but, believe us, brother, Texas is different. Texas is grown up.

The closest approach to Texas in size, amongst the 48 varieties, is California.

There are some ten "hub" cities in Texas, each with a market and trading territory of its own, large enough to make it a commercial capital of great importance in the distribution of merchandise, and sufficiently remote, in most cases, practically to eliminate real competition.

The government enumerators, in 1920, listed these cities like this:

San Antonio	161,379
Dallas	158,976
Houston	138,276
Fort Worth	106,482
El Paso	77,560
Galveston	44,255
Beaumont	40,422
Wichita Falls	40,079
Waco	38,500
Austin	34,876

making a total of 837,805 people. Of course they have grown considerably since then.

In visiting these cities the traveler learns something about distance, for jumps in Texas are real jumps. For instance, traveling from the West to the East, as did the writer, the first "jump" was from El Paso to San Antonio, 620 miles, exactly the same as the "jump" from the Grand Central Station in New York to the palatial railroad station in Cleveland, Ohio, or from London to Berne, Switzerland. And still in "West Texas" mind you.

From San Antonio to Fort Worth, however, the next jump, is a mere 354 miles, just like from New York City to Rochester, N. Y.

Fort Worth and Dallas are the "Twin Cities" of Texas, there being but 31 miles between them.

From Dallas to Wichita Falls is 178 miles, about the same as from New York City to Amsterdam, and from Wichita Falls to Waco is 278 miles, like the distance between New York City and Syracuse, or London and Paris.

From Waco to Austin is but 110 miles, scarcely as far as from New York City to Albany—only as far as Hudson, in fact, and from Austin to Houston is 164 miles, like stepping over from New York City to Schenectady, you know.

From Houston to Beaumont is a mere 84 miles, just like running up to Rhinecliff, and from Beaumont to Galveston is but 76 miles, no further than from New York City to Poughkeepsie.

So that, in order to make the ten principal cities in Texas, one has but 1,895 miles to travel—that's all. No farther than from New York City, via the Pennsylvania Railroad, through St. Louis, to Denver, Colo.—or the rail distance from London to Moscow. And it's all in Texas.

And just to talk a little more about size before leaving the idea, let it be noted that Texas comprises an area of 265,896 square miles. France could be laid down on the map of Texas and its 212,659 square miles would leave room for England to squeeze in without crowding, and the chinks could be filled with East and West Flanders. In an air-line, from Texarkana, on the Eastern border, to El Paso, facing Old and New Mexico, is as far as from New York to Chicago—almost 1,000 miles.

Texas, however, is a disappointment to the man who visits it for the first time, if he has visualized it as it is depicted by Bill Hart and Tom Mix and the rodeo people.

Tradition informs us that, at the building of the state, Texas was, so to speak, wild and wooly and hard to curl. There are many stories of how, in the early days, Texas was peopled with b-a-a-d men, who wore six-guns and did naughty things.

We are told that many years ago, a real estater, in trying to sell some land in West Texas, told his prospect that "Texas is a wonderful country. All they need there is rain and good society." To which the prospect replied, "Huh, that's all hell needs." But that was long, long ago.

Texas is still a cattle country, of course, but not the kind of cattle you mean.

The old range steers are a memory. The old "cowboys" are also a memory. The "Texas steer" of today is a pet. He is not wild, neither is he wooly. He is a big, fat, well bred, easy-going, mild-eyed beastie of exemplary habits and morals and the disposition of an angel.

There is no more "range" and no more rough riding. Cowboys nowadays have A. B. degrees and wear "Brooks model" clothes and wrist watches.

The old "ranches" are cut up into farms where agriculture is practiced by agricultural school graduates, and where living is much along the lines followed by the well-bred, extremely comfortable people in the so-called "effete East," except that the "farms" of Texas, while much smaller than the ranches of the good old days, are pretty awfully big as compared with the farms of say, Ohio or Pennsylvania or New York.

Floyd R. Todd, of Moline, Ill., vice-president of Deere & Co., manufacturers of farm implements, spent the winter at San Antonio, and was very pleasantly met by the writer. In talking over business conditions Mr. Todd said that Texas is the best market that Deere & Co. have today. The perplexity seems to be to get enough modern farm machinery on hand to supply the demand.

To a man of vision—provided that vision was long enough—this might indicate that Texas is sound as an agricultural state, and that the old ranges are giving way to intensive farming that pays better.

At Dallas we sat opposite a most genial gentleman at the dining table. He ordered his dinner like a connoisseur, and his manners were as polished, and he was as much at ease as any man could be. He started the conversation, which was extremely pleasant. Finally he politely inquired what our business was, and upon being told, vouchsafed the information that he was a "cow man."

"We fellows out here are getting civilized, you know. We wear the same kind of clothes and hats and shoes that you Easterners do. We don't make any stir when we go to New York, and those darned moving picture actor cowboys create as much excitement here in Dallas, or San Antonio as they do in New York."

And it's the truth. As this is being written, here in Houston, Texas, on March 10, they are getting ready for a cattleman's convention, and the windows are full of "freak stuff"—broad-brimmed hats, saddles, chaps, boots and other "novelty" merchandise which will be bought and worn out of respect to the old days, by the cattlemen who come to town dressed in hand tailored suits, vici kid shoes, "topcoats" and dogskin gloves, and who will don the habiliments of the past just as the Shriners put on their fez for an occasion.

Texas, except for size, is much like any other state—that is, any other real good state. In justice, however, it must be said that, in passing through Texas one rides through many miles of undeveloped land, land which, in all probability will be undeveloped for some time to come. The development is going to be most awfully gradual.

As the cities expand, the surrounding territory is gradually turned into small farms, and, one by one, slowly, the ranches are broken up and, as the roads are improved, and transportation problems solved, scientific drainage and irrigation will reclaim the land throughout the state—but that is all in the future.

Texas cities, however, are cities in every way. Some of them are not as progressive as others. San Antonio, for instance, is not so very active, simply because it is a home, an ideal home, if you please, for a great number of Texans who, having made theirs, have retired to San Antonio, and are really living.

They toil not, neither do they spin, and the younger element spend the money in living, too.

That does not mean that San Antonio

HOUSTON WILL HOIST A NEW FLAG

By MARCELLUS E. FOSTER
President Houston Chronicle

MARCELLUS E. FOSTER

TEXAS sends greetings to London and to the great British Empire. Houston wishes for the annual convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World a most eventful session. We trust that all views will be broadened and all interests cemented; that from this meeting there will go forth a message of peace, harmony and unity, not only for the business world but for all mankind.

The city of Houston, which so gracefully stepped aside at the Atlantic City meeting in favor of London, is now ready to be host for the 1925 convention, and we pledge ourselves to rival, if possible, the generous hospitality of our London friends.

We will show you a city that is the metropolis of the largest state in the American Union—a veritable empire in itself. A city not only of inspiring business but one with thrilling history. It has a ship channel linking us with the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean; ships are now entering our harbor from all parts of the old world. We are anxious to show you a new world—one where great oil wells spurt forth liquid gold and where vast cotton fields furnish the raw product for many of your great factories.

We will show you a city rich in natural resources and that has a history filled with tales of heroism; heroic sacrifices of soldier, priest and citizen.

Texas has been under six flags. She has given allegiance to Spain, France, Mexico, the Republic of Texas, the Southern Confederacy and the United States. We are ready to hoist another flag to greet our foreign guests and our fellow workers of this country. It will be a flag of faith and trust, emblazoned with colors and legends that signify to all nations peace and Christianity throughout the world.

HOUSTON AS SEEN BY AIRMAN IN THE CLOUDS

Cleanliness, order, efficiency—these three words figure largely in Houston, described by William S. Patton as "one of the real cities of the world." And you don't need the distance of an air-view, either. It stands a closeup—along every business street, in every residential section. With a population of nearly 150,000, it is a large cotton, rice and lumber market, and petroleum center. It has extensive manufacturers, with a total of nearly 400 plants.

is a dead one—but it is a resort town, a residential town, and the Boston and Charleston of Texas, if you know what I mean. It is the residence of the aristocrats—the old line Texans, and, by the way, San Antonio is the home of the chief shrine of Texas, the Alamo—where the Texas heros 80 years ago won immortal fame.

Beautiful homes, beautiful parks, beautiful country clubs and the aristocracy of the United States Army all lend an "air" to San Antonio that makes it a wonderful place. This city is the scene of the largest cantonment of the Regular Army in the country.

Dallas and Houston are two cities that are not typical at all. They are like, say, Rochester, or Indianapolis, or Omaha, or Columbus, or any one of half-a-hundred typical American cities—good looking, hustling, wide awake, neither Northern nor Southern nor Eastern nor Western, but American.

Yes, friend, take Texas seriously. Take it most almighty seriously, and don't for the love of Mike, try to get an idea that Texas as it is today is anything like the hokum of the five-cent movies, for it is not.

But Texas is Big. And Texas is Alive. And Texas is a very good place to go.

One thing, however, that smacks of the old days, is the spirit of good fellowship and hospitality that is found everywhere. The men of Texas are real fellows, and their hospitality is as genuine, as spontaneous and as freely given as ever in the romantic days. In that respect they are way above par.

COUNTRY OF "MAGNIFICENT DISTANCES" AND MAGNIFICENT OPPORTUNITY

President Hamilton of International-Great Northern Railroad Bespeaks Hearty Welcome to Southwest

To the Delegates of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in Convention Assembled in London, England:

TEXAS, the great and rapidly developing Empire of the Southwestern United States, cordially invites you to hold your 1925 convention at Houston, where seventeen railroads meet the sea, on the coast of the Mexican Gulf.

Texas comprises within her borders an area of 266,000 square miles, eight per cent of the total area of the United States and equivalent to the combined areas of France, England and Wales; has a farm land area of one hundred and fourteen million acres and yields annually, from its soil, products of agriculture, the forest, the oil well and the mine to the value of more than one and a half billion dollars. In 1923 our state produced in excess of 4,300,000 bales of cotton or 43 per cent of the entire production of the United States.

The domestic herds of the state comprise more than twelve million animals.

Our mineral resources, although yet barely scratched, produce annually in excess of forty million barrels of petroleum and two million tons of coal.

Manufactured products have an annual value in excess of one billion dollars.

If you will cut, in a map of the United States, the boundaries of Texas, and turn back the silhouette on its Eastern border, it will reach clear across the eastern half of the United States and into the Atlantic Ocean; hinged on the Western border it will reach 200 miles into the Pacific Ocean and hinged to the North, well across the internation boundary into Canada. This vast territory of the "Lone Star State" is gridironed with 16,000 miles of railway, making its every portion of easy access to the visitor.

The big business interests of Houston and of Texas stand squarely behind the Advertising Association of Houston in its invitation to the world to come and see for itself how its cotton is grown, picked and shipped; how its live stock is raised and marketed; how great modern cities have become actualities in a state where but a few years ago, in the opinion of the world, the long-horned steer was the principal product. There is still much of the picturesque frontier days to be found on the Western Texas prairies; much that is unique and interesting. Within the vast area of our State may be seen many of the processes of our national development still under way—from the wide cattle ranges of the prairies and the vast areas of virgin soil just breaking to the plow, to the large city's most modern development.

Someone has said that Texas is "A country of magnificent distances"; it is for more than that—it is a country of magnificent opportunity.

"Hospitality" peculiarly typical of the Southern and Southwestern portion of the United States is written large across the map of Texas. We modestly believe that we have in this commonwealth of ours a people among the finest on the face of the earth. Come down and get acquainted.

Elsewhere in this publication it has been the privilege of the Railroad enterprise, I have the honor to manage, to set forth in pictorial form some of the things that are well worth seeing and knowing about this great state.

International-Great Northern Railroad, with its 1160 miles of trunk line "All in Texas and all for Texas" extends to all a hearty welcome to Texas, to Houston, and the great Southwest.

Cordially yours,

T. A. HAMILTON, President.

International-Great Northern Railroad Company.

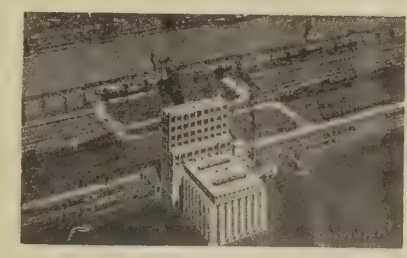
HOUSTON exported her first cotton bale in 1919; Houston is now the second cotton port of America. In 1919, the cotton exportation was 43,341 bales; in 1924 it will be 1,500,000 bales.

Houston with one twine mill and two textile mills has just begun her cotton manufacturing development. Natural advantages with particular reference to proximity to raw materials, transportation facilities and labor supply, assure for Houston rapid progress as a textile center.

Houston's oil industry embraces all phases of the business: production, storage, refining and distribution of the finished products to all points of the world. The Houston district includes 18 producing oil fields with an annual production of approximately 40,000 barrels of crude oil. There are eight operating refineries on the Houston Ship Channel with a daily capacity of 48,000 barrels.



Houston is in the greatest rice producing area in America. Six rice mills annually export more than 500,000 bags.

Houston is the greatest combination retail and wholesale lumber market in Southwestern United States. Houston lumber exports annually exceed $40,000,000.

Houston with her deepwater terminals, inland waterway system and 17 railroads, is attracting the attention of the world as a shipping point.

HOUSTON'S CONVENTION COMMITTEE READY FOR ALL OCCASIONS

Houston's Committee?—What kind? That depends upon the occasion. Sub-titles are assigned commensurate with the duties assigned. It is that kind of a committee, composed of that kind of men who, when anything happens along to be done simply jump in and do it—and do it right.

To illustrate: During the cattlemen's convention (at which time this picture was taken) this was called the "Steering Committee." Appropriate? Well! Nothing else but.

During the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World this will be the Ad-visory Committee—just as in case of a convention of the manufacturing confectioners it would be known as "The Candy Kids."

These men are the "go getters" who attend to everything that is to be attended to. You know they should all be called "George" for whenever there is anything of the "Let George do it" kind, these fellows are on the job.

ECONOMISTS PICK HOUSTON AS COMING METROPOLIS OF THE SOUTH

Port of a Vast Domain Rich in Natural Resources, City Now Striving Toward Commercial Supremacy—Frontier Passing

By PAUL L. WAKEFIELD

AS one of the greatest producing centers of raw materials and the one of which the least is known, Texas with her 171,000,000 acres of land which embraces vast resources of oil, mineral, lumber, cattle and cotton, offers advertising and business men of the world a new country to conquer.

One-third of the world's cotton crop is raised in the Lone Star State, while one-tenth of the cattle and one-seventh of the oil comes from here.

Texas is a virgin territory. Her natural resources are untouched and yet she surpasses in raw materials any of her sisters through the length and breadth of the United States, of her 171,000,000 acres only 32,000,000 are under cultivation.

Probably her greatest claim to international trade is in the export of cotton. The Texas cotton crop for 1923 equaled more in dollars and cents than the entire wheat crop of the United States. Texas is geographically and commercially the gateway to Latin America and Mexico.

Texas has had little advertising other than that of the romance surrounding her famous Texas Rangers and the gun packing, hard riding and swarthy cow puncher of the west. She has that side, and of the cattle industry she is proud, but there is a new Texas coming on that is reaching out for some of the north, east, south and west. Modern agricultural implements have replaced the oxen, farms with bristling windmills and homesteads have sprung up where tenant farmers' shacks once stood. "Uncle Sam's biggest son," as Arthur Brisbane spoke of Texas recently, has awakened to the riches of natural resources.

The growth and the development of Texas during the past decade, has surpassed probably that of any other state in the Union. Texas has developed some advertising experts along with her commercial and agricultural growth and these men have realized the limited knowledge that national advertising writers and space buyers possess concerning the resources and the potential possibilities of the state which is larger than the whole of France.

It is the opinion not only of advertising experts of the Lone Star state, but of some of the world's most successful advertising writers and buyers that the advertising fraternity needs to know more of Texas and that Texas should know more of the men who acquaint the world of what its neighbor has.

The Atlantic City convention of the A. A. C. W. crystallized the sentiment of world advertising heads concerning Texas and her needs for advertising. Plans were laid with all of the cards on the table to do for the advertising fraternity of the world and the state of Texas, what would result in a great mutual benefit.

Holding the 1925 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in Texas will mark an event of accomplishment in the history of Texas and advertising.

Advertising men the world over are familiar with the eastern section of the United States. They are familiar with the products of these states and the raw materials from which they are made. The Texas field offers the lure of undiscovered treasures to develop and write about. Fiction writers have invaded the oil fields and romance of the west and painted Texas as a pioneer and frontier state. The advertising writers of tomorrow will catch the same spirit of romance and pioneering in their copy when writing of Texas, her products, industry and unlimited resources of raw materials. The same artists who visited Texas to paint illustration from such western tales of Bower and Gray and yarns of oil by Puetello and Beach will visualize and paint the same picturesqueness and romance in his color plates for national advertisers of oil, its by-products, leather, and the various raw materials which Texas leads, for advertising is the fiction of tomorrow.

Texas has as natural and advantageous topography as that of any other country in the world of its size, and this brings us to the climax of our story and Houston, the convention city of 1925.

Houston, a thriving city of almost 200,000 population, has been picked by numerous eastern capalists as the coming metropolis of the south on account of its commanding location.

With 17 railroads and a safe landlocked harbor where ships from all ports of the world discharge and take on their cargoes, there is reason enough for Houston's claim to transportation power.

Millions of bales of cotton pass through Houston every year. On her deep water channel is located the world's largest compress and a number of the largest oil refineries, a massive flour mill. Other industries of various kinds are springing up on every hand.

Houston is fanned in the summer by the cool breezes from the Gulf of Mexico and snow covers the ground once in a decade. If you are interested in knowing more of America and her undeveloped resources, you will want to come to Texas and bring the A. A. C. W. convention with you in 1925.

FACTS ABOUT TEXAS

TEXAS is the largest State in the Union, having an area of 265,896 square miles—262,398 square miles of land and 3,498 square miles of water. There are 249 organized counties and 4 unorganized counties in Texas.

Population—The 1910 census gives the population of Texas as 3,896,541. If the rate of increase remains the same as it was between 1900 and 1910, the population of the State in 1919 is 4,687,135. Texas is rapidly going up in rank in population; in 1850 it was twenty-fifth among the States; in 1870 it was nineteenth; in 1890 it was seventh; and in 1910 it was fifth. The scholastic population of the State this year is 1,245,278.

Topography—The general slope of Texas is in a northwesterly direction from the Gulf of Mexico. The mountains are in the western part of the State. There are two peaks above 8000 feet—El Capitan in the Guadalupe Mountains, which is 8690 feet, and Baldy Peak in Jeff Davis County, which is 8382 feet. There are over 100 peaks which are above 5000 feet. The average elevation of Texas is 1700 feet.

Rivers—The principal rivers of Texas are the Red River, the Rio Grande, the Brazos, the Colorado, the Trinity, and the Pecos. The Brazos River drains approximately one-fourth of the State.

Climate—The annual rainfall varies in Texas according to the section of the State. The average annual rainfall in east Texas is 55 inches; in west Texas it is 10 inches. The mean annual temperature ranges from 55 degrees in north Texas to 72 degrees in south Texas.

Agriculture—Texas is primarily an agriculture state and is first among the States in the value of farm products. There are over 500,000 separate farms in Texas. The United States Department of Agriculture reports the following livestock in Texas on January 1, 1919: horses, 1,164,000; mules 792,000; cattle 5,021,000; sheep 2,320,000. The total value of this livestock was placed at $454,838,000.

Railroads—Texas has more railroad mileage than any other States in the United States. The last statistical abstract published by the United States government shows that Texas has 15,866 miles of railroad, which the next State in rank, Illinois, has only 12,141 miles. This does not include yard tracks and sidings.

Automobiles—There have been 309,285 motor vehicles registered in Texas up to October for the year 1919.

HOUSTON—1925

HOUSTON COMPLETING THE BIG SALE IT STARTED A YEAR AGO

By WILLIAM S. PATTON

President Advertising Association of Houston

THE Advertising Association of Houston has sold a big idea to the people of Houston—the idea of having the 1925 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. This sale was made with an argument running something like this!

Houston is already a convention city, known well and favorably throughout Texas as such.

Houston has a tremendous lot of good things of which the world at large, outside of Texas, knows all too little, and which should be advertised.

Human ingenuity has not as yet devised any method of advertising to equal first-hand knowledge, but, next to this first-hand knowledge, is the information given second-hand by a trained salesman—particularly when that trained salesman is not personally or financially interested in the telling. The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World is a gathering of the very cream of advertising experts from everywhere — men trained to observe and to tell what they observe.

It would be ridiculous even to attempt to compute the financial outlay necessary to collect such an aggregation provided their time was paid for plus their traveling expenses. It would be equally futile to try to estimate, in dollars and cents, the good these people could do, upon their return home, in the way of spreading propaganda regarding the City of Houston.

We want them to come to Houston for their 1925 convention. The financial backing we shall require will be a mere drop in the bucket compared to the entire expense of a convention, and we will bring to Houston the greatest aggregation of keenly trained brains possible to assemble from the four corners of the earth. They will return to their homes to tell their friends and fellow citizens many nice things about Houston and Texas. They will return with first-hand knowledge of Texans and Houstonians; they will have become acquainted with a tremendously important market and will, in a majority of cases, revise their opinion of Texas and Texans.

We can demonstrate our power for entertaining. We can prove to the world at large that Southern hospitality is a great deal more than a mere figure of speech; we can show these people that our brand of civilization is just the same as theirs, and that Houston is one of the real cities of the world—Let's go!

And the people of Houston said "Go to it!"

Now we want to sell this idea to you in London and here is our sales argument:

First—frankly, we want you.

We want you to come to our city.

We want to entertain you.

We want you to see us in our own home city and we want you to see our city.

We want you to get first-hand knowledge of Houston and of Texas.

We want the publicity this crowd can give any convention city.

We want you to jaunt down our way and find out for yourselves just how much justification we have for our pride in our home city.

We want you to know us—know our people, know our country.

We are going to let the rest of Texas help us plan "stunts" for you—but for the most part the "stunts" are to be of a semi-educational type—visualizing to you the magnitude of Texas in square miles, in resources, in produce and in actual selling territory.

We want to ruin your digestion by overfeeding you. We want to wear you out absolutely by keeping you jumping from one interesting thing to another.

WILLIAM S. PATTON

We want to hear you yell for help to protect you against utter and absolute exhaustion from entertainment.

Of course, we know that this convention will be tremendously beneficial to Houston, and perhaps, are selfish in wanting you—but also know that, from an educational standpoint, as an opportunity to study a great market at first hand, we can give you something almost as valuable as you can give us and we feel that, after all is said and done, the benefit will be pretty close to a 50-50 proposition.

Now that you are thoroughly sold on the idea of Houston in 1925 we thank you. We commend your good judgment and promise that when you come to Houston, we will send you home tired, happy, converted into Houston boosters.

TRIBUTE DUE CORNELL

MUCH of the success of the On-to-Houston movement of the Advertising Association of Houston is due to the untiring efforts of Robert H. Cornell, toastmaster par-excellence and sailor extraordinary who, while doing nothing else, is Assistant Publisher of The Houston Chronicle.

Few people, even in Houston, know "Robert H. Cornell" but Houstonians and advertising men everywhere know "Bob" Cornell—know him and like him, too.

There are men, here and there, who, because of a tremendous amount of personality and humanness; of likable qualities and a superabundance of love for their fellow men, never get away from the foreshortened, intimate names. These men should be tremendously proud of what may be termed their "trade names" for trade names are seldom bestowed unless warranted.

For instance, Mr. R. F. R. Huntsman, President of the Brooklyn Standard Union, is, always has been and always will be known as "Bob."

Daniel D. Moore, Publisher of the Fort Worth, Tex., Record will always be "Uncle Dan," and "Pop" Freeman, "Eddie" Burke, "Tony" Lorenzen, "Al" Shuman and many others, including "Bob" Cornell, are too well liked to ever get away from their nicknames.

"Bob" Cornell had a selfish purpose, perhaps, in engineering things the way they finally shaped themselves at Atlantic City in 1923.

He got everybody all "het up" about 1924, figuring all the time on making a pinch hit by gracefully yielding to London at the last moment. He was willing and even anxious to go to London in 1924, but he had Houston all ready, so that, if London had fallen down, the convention would have been Houston's.

Bob wanted to go to London with his fellow Houstonians in order to exhibit his splendid seamanship—he having been across some years ago, with the late George H. Larke who, up to the time of his death, delighted in starting to tell how Bob crossed the pond—Bob and his lemons and his absorbent cotton.

Larke always liked to start telling this story—but he never finished because the memory of Bob's vain efforts to retain the few specimens of food, and his distinct disapproval of the change in taste this food had on its return trip always made Larke stop and—well anyway Bob is an experienced sailor.

So, being somewhat of a politician, Bob fixed it so that the London delegation was tremendously impressed with his sportsmanship, and the Houstonians go to London backed by the good will and support of practically every club for the 1925 convention.

Of course Bob did not do this alone—he didn't have to—but it was his foresightedness, his wonderful selling talks and his tremendous personal popularity that swung the rest of the Houston delegation to his way of thinking and ultimately produced the desired effect.

It might be remarked that this was written at the suggestion and earnest solicitation of Mr. John H. Payne, Business Manager of the Houston Press, who adds that Bob Cornell is the hardest competitor to buck that there is anywhere—and that, as a competitor, he thoroughly and honestly hates Bob Cornell—but as a newspaper man and a fellow human he has to love and admire him.

TEXAS CRAVES CHANCE TO SHOW WORTH

By Jno. D. Dyer,

President, Guaranty National Bank of Houston

Associated Advertising Club of the World in convention at London:

THE various advertising interests of Houston, Tex., are very wholehearted in their co-operation with the Advertising Association of Houston in inviting you to hold your 1925 Convention in our city.

As president of the Guaranty National Bank of Houston, I want to add my personal invitation to that of the club, and to assure you that while the party, when it gets to Houston, will be primarily the guests of the Advertising Association of Houston, all of Houston, and in fact, all of Texas, will co-operate in entertaining you, providing things for you to do and sights for you to see.

We Texas people take a great delight in entertaining our friends and people we want for friends who come to us from the less fortunate parts of the world, and we take a pride in sending them home feeling that they have visited the best state in the union, where they have met the best people in the world.

If this sounds boastful or bombastic you may consider it a challenge and a promise. A challenge to you to make good, and a promise to you that we will make good.

Feeling sure that your better judgment will bring you to Texas in 1925, I reiterate the invitation to you to come to Texas.

HOW THE SEA WAS BROUGHT TO HOUSTON

PORT HOUSTON TURNING BASIN

The largest ships that sail the Seven Seas call at Houston docks with the world's goods. Great wharves with deep water alongside avoid lightering, magnificent bunker facilities enable quick refueling, whether with coal or oil, and the width of the basin makes it easy to turn a vessel of any tonnage—an advantage that is not possessed by many harbors justly famous in world commercial annals.

TEXAS, THE 10th DISTRICT, A.A.C.W., AWAKE TO ITS OPPORTUNITIES

By DALE C. ROGERS

Chairman Tenth District, A. A. C. W.

TEXAS is fast responding to the constructive efforts of advertising. This is being brought about largely through the combined efforts of the Advertising

DALE C. ROGERS

Clubs of the state. The "push forward" work of Texas advertising men during the past few years, with the organization of many new clubs, gained the attention of the A. A. C. W. to such an extent that at the Atlantic City convention, Texas was made a district within itself. Included in the Tenth District prior to last June was Texas, New Mexico, and part of Louisiana. Now the development of Texas and the Tenth District is squarely up to the advertising clubs and advertising of men of Texas themselves.

The people of Texas are just waking up to two things: first, that Texas needs advertising activities; second, that the A. A. C. W. needs to know more the present and future of Texas.

Texas from an advertising and sales standpoint is a market within itself. It is an entire trade section. Its habits, customs, needs, and desires must be taken into individual consideration. That a commodity will respond to a certain advertising and merchandising plan successful in the New England or Middle Western States is no big assurance that the same results will be obtained in Texas. Study Texas—Texas resources. See Texas.

Just remember—Texas produced almost one-half the world's cotton crop in 1923; that the great coastal country is rich and picturesque with its hundreds of thousands of acres of rice; that it is one of the greatest oil-producing regions in the world; that the verdant Rio Grande Valley with its millions of citrus fruit trees will in another year or two enter the markets of the world; that the sulphur mines are producing mountains of this colorful necessity; that dairy stock, and fine beefs, have in large part replaced the scrawny range stock; that more than $10,000,000 worth of poultry and eggs were shipped from Texas during 1923. Yes, Texas, along with the rest of the world, is fast waking up. There is a store of information and interest awaiting the visitor to Texas today. The A. A. C. W. members who attended the convention in Dallas, with its circle tour over the state, have a great surprise awaiting them.

Manufacturing industries are fast developing. Intensive cultivation is beginning to take the place of the prairie ranges. Transportation facilities are good.

With all this development work Texas needs the constructive force of the Advertising Club, the Advertising Man—the help of the A. A. C. W. And in doing this great work there is great experience, romance, fun and reward to all who take part. It is for these many reasons that the Tenth District A. A. C. W. is active. It is active to its responsibilities, its possibilities. It invites the world to participate.

WESTERN ENTERPRISE, SOUTHERN HOSPITALITY —HOUSTON WANTS TO PROVE IT

By ROBERT H. CORNELL

Assistant to the Publisher, Houston Chronicle

ROBERT H. CORNELL

HOUSTON, center of the Union's first state in agricultural resources and leading port of the Union's second state in world export trade, needs the presence of delegates from the world's Advertising Clubs!

At Atlantic city last year the Advertising Association of Houston was thoroughly convinced that the cause of ADVERTISING could be best advanced by meeting in convention this year in London. Houston men are as genuinely sincere in the belief now that the necessary impetus for the work of Advertising Clubs in 1925 calls for convention assembly in the section of the United States where the field for most profitable advertising activity exists, and which will in no uncertain terms register its appreciation of the inspiration which only a community's contact with the world's publicity purveyors will give.

At London, Houston will present every qualification required in return for the convention entertainment privilege; necessary, fully subscribed convention fund; exceptional hotel, auditorium and transportation facilities, coupled with every resource of the 250 leading business firms (manufacturers, bankers, jobbers, exporters, publishers, retailers, etc,) represented in active membership of the thirteen-year-old Advertising Association of Houston.

Houston is often referred to as the "City of Western Enterprise and Southern Hospitality"—— make us prove it!

But they could not copy my mind,

THE TEXAN: HE BREATHES THE SPIRIT OF YOUTH

He is Not a Southerner, Nor a Westerner, But a Texan and He Will Tell You True Tales of the Indian and Covered Wagon Pioneer

By ROY G. WATSON
President and Publisher, The Houston Post

A MAN from Texas is never a Southerner, neither is he a Westerner—he is a Texan. He is a pioneer, and you will meet him in the four corners of the earth.

Texas is too young to have lost its pioneer spirit, but the melting pot has been at work and although his restless spirit may send him to the remotest spots of the globe, he never forgets his allegiance to his state and will impress upon you that he is a Texan. And you will like him, too. No matter what his age may be, he will fairly breathe the spirit of youth—the spirit of Texas.

So young is Texas that there are many living today who can tell you strange tales of the romantic days when Texas was in its earliest infancy, when only cattle and roving bands of Indians were to be found in places now boasting eighteen and twenty story buildings, and when the old "covered wagons" of pioneer days rumbled along over the prairies where now civilization glides in its limousines on asphalt boulevards.

Texas is a romance in itself, and this romance fairly seeps its way into the very blood of its children, so that every native or even adopted son becomes involuntarily saturated with it.

The broad miles upon miles of prairies, mountains, deserts and smiling valleys which make Texas the largest state in the Union have been governed by six flags—the French, the Spanish, the Mexican, the Republic, the Confederate and the United States.

But the Latin races could not hold it. Realizing the danger of Anglo-Saxon invasion, the Latins tried by every means in their power to keep the Anglo-Saxon out. A few managed to get inside the borderline, however, and although but a handful, they fulfilled the worst fears of the Mexicans and tore loose from Mexico all the Mexican territory north of the Rio Grande and proclaimed it the Republic of Texas. This was but yesterday—actually less than one hundred years ago.

Responding to the spirit of its new masters, the magic lands of Texas blossomed and bore fruit until today she is the wonder of the world. These remarkable men, the pioneers of Texas, came from the Carolinas, from Georgia, from Virginia and from Kentucky, the purest sources of Anglo-Saxon blood in this country. They had vision which saw a century ahead, and the strength to grasp and carve out for themslevs an empire. And today their sons and grandsons are reaping the harvest of their endeavors and sowing new seed for their own children's children.

All of these men had the "pioneer spirit"—the very essence of Americanism. With this common characteristic as a starting point, the melting pot began its assimilating operations and the final result is the Texan of today. The South contributed its courtly manners and culture, the West its open-handed hospitality and the East its business acumen and progressiveness.

Today in an elevator in any of Houston's sky-scraper office buildings, you will see all of the men remove their hats in deference to the elevator girl. A stranger marvels at the cordiality of his reception, and if from the East, delights in the straight-forward manner in which business is conducted.

But there are no Latin or Indian characteristics left whatsoever. No siestas, no indolent leisure class with its inevitable companion peasantry is here. The melting pot has done away with all of that. Those who would while away the hours in dreams of tomorrow are urged to cross the Rio Grande and join their "mañana" compatriots to the South.

ROY G. WATSON

The first settlers for the most part occupied immense tracts of land which supported thousands of herds of cattle. The cowboy, therefore, soon became the generally accepted type of Texan. But so swiftly did Texas grow in population and wealth that the great ranches were soon divided up as the land became too valuable for use as mere pasture land. Thus the cowboy of old has practically disappeared, until today a cowboy in "chaps," red kerchief and sombrero is as much an attraction and novelty to the modern Fordized "cow puncher" as he is to the world at large.

But not quite all of the great ranches have disappeared. There is still Santa Gertrudis in South Texas which boasts some million and a half acres. So large is it that the managers use airplanes to reach distant parts of the estate. The "homestead" is a structure of marble and tile, of terraces and enclosed gardens, costing into the hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is so beautifully adapted to its setting that it is a delight to the eye.

These large ranches which have escaped intact through the years are usually governed by University men, under the most modern and scientific methods. The "ranch houses" are run on the same lines as are to be found in the homes of cultured, well-to-do men and women the world over.

Whatever the Texan may be, he is not provincial. Separated as the cities are by great distances, he thinks nothing of traveling all night for a business engagement, or even for a dance or some social entertainment. This scorn of distance is so inbred that even trips of thousands of miles grow to mean but little to him, and this is the probable explanation of why the Texans are such world travelers.

This willingness to travel sends many of the younger generations into the large universities of the East, but the great majority of the boys and girls of Texas go to one of their home institutions. Even those who take their regular courses in colleges outside the state are usually impelled by their loyalty to all things Texan to go to some Texas university for a post-graduate course. These Texas universities are co-educational, for the women and girls in Texas are given an equal and often preferred footing in all callings.

In Houston, Rice Institute, a great richly endowed co-educational university, bears favorable comparison in equipment and educational facilities with the world's foremost institutions. Its broadening influence over Houston is naturally very great and is making of this city one of the leading educational and cultural centers of the South and the West.

No city in Texas is so blessed with such fine schools, beautiful homes, up-to-the-minute office buildings and hotels, large parks and amusement facilities as is Houston. And these things of course are here as the result of the demand of the citizens—the native Houstonians.

Houston was the first capital of the Republic, and is recognized as one of the oldest and most conservative cities of the state. The citizens of Houston can boast of being true Texans and truly representative of the best in the state.

Well dressed, youthful, happy and prosperous appearing, they keep the wheels of progress moving and their plans for the future cause the old wheels to hustle to run abreast with them.

They wanted a harbor and although fifty miles from the sea, they matched dollars with the government and voted bond issue after bond issue until they got it. They wanted to advertise their port to the world and they brought the largest vessel ever to enter the Gulf of Mexico, the great 563-foot French liner, the Lafayette, up to their own docks to carry a party of Trade Trippers on a cruise to the West Indies.

They modestly admit that Houston is the largest inland cotton market in the world—now they want it to be the largest cotton exporting port and already, after but two seasons, it is ranking third in all the ports of the world.

These things but show the stamina of these Texas Houstonians. They want the best of everything and they usually get it.

A new Art Museum, new theatres, new hotels, new recreational facilities are the proof that progress is not all along business lines either. Houston boasts five golf courses, two of which are public links. Houstonians are great sport lovers and support more amateur baseball diamonds than any city of its size in the world. The city, being near the water, has a flourishing Yacht Club, while the surrounding territory develops some of the best hunting and fishing to be found anywhere.

Texans are music loving people, and the best of the world's artists never fail to include Texas in their tours. Aside from the annual trips of the largest Grand Opera companies. Houston two seasons ago organized a Grand Opera Company of its own. Assembling selected artists from the various opera companies of this and other countries, in the European manner, a week of Grand Opera by the Houston Grand Opera Company was given. The heavy expense was underwritten by local citizens. A well developed local Symphony Orchestra likewise attests the Houstonians' love of good music.

The manner of living is much the same whether a man be rich or poor. Anything approaching tenements is unknown, and the smallest income is usually sufficient to support a neat little bungalow with a garage large enough for a family Ford.

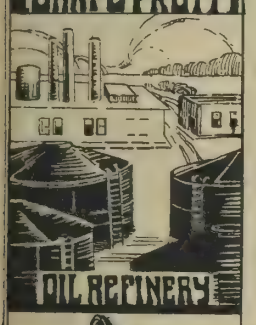
The women of Texas are as much slaves to the latest decree from the Rue de la Paix as any Parisienne, and they know how to wear their clothes, too. Trim ankled, well dressed and intelligent, the Texas woman is distinguishable in any gathering. She is somewhat slow about getting into politics, but once let her set her mind in that direction and she will just about get what she goes after.

It is chiefly due to the activities of the various women's clubs that Texas cities are clean, attractive places.

Houston's esplanaded boulevards and its palm lined drives are a monument to their work.

Roses bloom the year around in Houston's gardens, and her cape jessamines, more familiar to the Northerner as the gardenia, blossoms on the esplanades in exquisite profusion.

Texas cities are happy, industrious communities in which all the citizens take an active part.



Servants' hire is small enough to allow most of the women to escape the heavier work at least and gives them time for club work and amusements.

Texans are a home-loving people. The masculine head of the house will put in a full day at the office, and while perhaps lunching downtown at a club or a cafeteria, invariably dines at home and devotes his evenings to his family.

WHAT IS THE ULTIMATE OBJECT?

Are all the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World Conventions to be "brass tack" sessions?

A new note, a different theme was struck at Atlantic City. The chord that's still reverberating was caused by that large delegation from England.

The high lights of the last convention were:

> "—One thing expected to develop from the sessions is a better working understanding with the other nations—"
> "—Advertising with its ability to influence sentiment, possesses the power for creating a world brotherhood—"
> Senator Edge said, "I am convinced we would have a better understanding abroad at this very moment if in some instances we substituted advertising for ambassadors. Then, perhaps, we could really reach a condition of 'open covenants openly arrived at!—'"

Those thoughts early registered with the British delegation. And, so, when thru their spokesmen, John Cheshire, Harold Vernon, W. S. Crawford, and others, they presented the big thought that thru the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World there might come about a better international understanding—if the convention was held in London—some of the boys from Houston began from that moment to work for London. . . . .

What civilized nations, peace conferences, world wars, diplomats, and even the teachings of all religions have failed to do —accomplish universal understanding— was it too much to expect of advertising? The men from Britain and from Houston thought not.

The convention went to London.

Houston saw something far larger and finer than merely to secure the convention from London.

That is why Houston has qualified to hold the Convention in 1925. Houston desires to carry on the work started at Atlantic City.

From the material side—

Houston and Texas will bring you into contact with a land that produces everything humanity needs or craves. But it's a land that yearns for more people—a land so precious that it has been fought for and has lived under six flags in the past century and a half.

Houston wants you for 1925.

What is the Ultimate Object! Some of us in Houston believe each generation adds its chapter to the World's Bible. Never before has the world been so heart-sick from misunderstanding. We hate because we don't know.

Permit Houston the honor of holding the 1925 Convention so that this better understanding may reach a fuller culmination.

EDITOR'S VIEW OF HIS STATE AND ITS PEOPLE

Literal Interpretation of Texas and Texans, Prosperous, Happy and Progressive—Material Strength in Oil, Cattle, Cotton and Lumber

By WALTER B. LISTER
Managing Editor, The Houston Press

THEY tell that many years ago, in northern, eastern and eastern southern states, sheriffs used to go to a man's house with a warrant for his arrest and find pasted on the door a notice: "G. T. T."

They tell also that the sheriff would merely sigh and file away the warrant to collect dust. "Gone to Texas" was a phrase which silenced the Yankee law.

In the first place, the sheriffs are said to have reasoned, Texas was a long ways off and the man wasn't worth the expense of traveling that far; in the second place Texas wasn't too healthy for cranks on law-enforcement.

To some degree this picturing of Texas hangs over into the present time as a colorful fiction of Americana.

Say "Texas" to the fellow in Columbus, Ohio, or Bangor, Maine, and he pictures cowboys loping into town on Saturday night to toss the reins over his hoss' head in front of the Powder Kid's saloon; bronze-faced men with dirty red scarfs knotted about their copper-hued necks empting Colts at each other across a dusty Main Street; maybe bands of Indians wandering across the unsettled reaches of prairie land.

Artemus Ward once commented: "It ain't folks ignorance that hurts; it's the things they know that ain't so."

And the picture of Texas as a wild, half-savage state peopled mostly by gunmen and Longhorn cattle is one of the things that ain't so.

The real Texas is a state forever changing, forever growing and moving; half developed, not quite certain of itself because of its rapid adolescence; an empire state, of such vast extent and boundless resources as to be almost unmanageable, even for itself.

Texas right now is like a rugged, clean-limbed schoolboy from the backwoods, terribly self-conscious, hiding behind a gruff defiance, and with strength enough, once a little more development has come, to lick all the other kids five at a time.

Remember, first, that the Texas of the cities and the Texas of the farm and ranch lands are as different as night and day.

Texas cities are shooting up, running to big buildings and expensive hotels (the complete paving of streets and reorganization of schools can come later).

There is more single-hearted devotion to business in a Texas city than in New York. Here Salesmanship is most emphatically spelled with a capital S. It's a subject more absorbing than baseball. It's something to shape lives for, to boast of, and to discuss interminably at "How to Give Service Through Selling" meetings.

The Zenith of Sinclair Lewis' "Babbitt" never had more enthusiastic luncheon clubs than Texas cities. The Kiwanis, Rotary, Civitan and other business-civic ideals have chance for full play.

It's dollar-chasing turned into an uplifting crusade, carried on by well-dressed, clean cut voung men and middle-aged men 16 hours a day.

If you put over your business on a 97.4 per cent efficiency basis, you can talk condescendingly to others and they stand for it. If you capitalize and enlarge your success by working out a complete "Service to the Ultimate" campaign, you are one of the Apostles.

The Phi Beta Kappa key of business unlocks the welcome of the upward and onward middle class as does nothing else.

There's nothing mean or vicious about it. Everybody is doing well. Wages are high and savings banks are popular.

New real estate additions have mushroom growth. Business houses enlarge their plants; employers build better homes; employes build homes of their own—and the street car companies suffer because so many drive to work. Texas is sixth in the Union in number of autos owned.

Civic pride is shaped by all this, naturally. Cities vie with each other on building permits totals, railroad shipments, bank clearings, etc.

The man who brings more business to a city is hailed as a leading citizen. Newspapers, in describing any project, civic, artistic, or sanitary, never omit how many dollars it will cost.

In cattle, in the second place. That was Texas' first wealth, the herds that were pastured on gigantic ranches and driven to Kansas over a long and dangerous trail.

In cotton, in the third place. That's unevenly distributed. Some black-soil counties have an enormous yield but others, less fortunate in soil, nevertheless take their toll from the handling and shipping.

In lumber, in the fourth place. The heavily forested pine woods of East Texas have made many a fortune—and are still doing it.

Down in the Rio Grande Valley a new unit within the state is gathering strength. The population there is largely northen—farmers brought down by colonization companies to farm intensively the rich land which is lavish in producing cotton and all manner of fruits.

There are many incidental industries, too, such as the Freeport sulphur vein, turning out a large fraction of the world's sulphur supply.

Outside the cities—Houston and Galveston with their shipping, Dallas with its rail and commercial center, Fort Worth, "the old cow town," and San Antonio, with its climate for retired folks and trade with Mexico and Southern Texas—the picture is different.

The farmers of Texas aren't so fortunate. Cotton is their mainstay, and when cotton fails it brings a good deal of despair. Rotation of crops and intensive cultivation—those watchwords of the New Agriculture—have just started to be tried out.

There is an army of tenant farmers, poor white, foreign-born, and negro, which migrates from year to year. They take what they can and if it isn't enough to pay their debts they pack up and move on—a long, sorrowful, hard-working train.

The folks "at the forks of the creek" (Texas has as many rivers and creeks as a leaf has veins) are in some measure the folks of the "Gone to Texas" days. They are silent, churchgoing, stern people, quick to resent the intrusion of a stranger. Their farmhouses are widely scattered through the piny woods, but wherever a few houses cluster together there is generaly a tiny white Baptist or Methodist church, presided over once every two or three weeks by "the pastor" from the nearest town.

Very fine folks, if they know you. If they don't their attitude is most distinctly sullen. They are clannish; one or two families may make up the greater part of one county's population. When the families clash the gunplay of the old days comes back; and many is the gun duel in sparsely populated Texas that never is heard of beyond its county.

These are the counties where feeling is sometimes bitter, too, between the foreign-born and the descendants of pioneers. There is many a political ring that controls law-enforcement, and many a small electorate which while staunchly dry at the polls would accept calmly the assassination of an officer who pried too closely into the making of moonshine.

The Southern ideal of womanhood flourishes there. A good woman is something to kill for (though she may be forced to work long days in the fields); conversely, a bad woman is the vilest thing in God's scheme.

They have pretty girls in the settlements at the forks of the creek, and these girls make good, old-fashioned wives who would shrink from the terrific excitement of Texas cities with their heavy auto traffic, movies and theaters running every day, and houses close together.

They have fine old men at the forks of the creek, as well; kindly fellows with a twinkle in their blue eyes who can tell you all about the fire at the sawmill in 1897, or the killing of Bob Smith on the courthouse in 1903. They may have had feuds in their families, fierce quarrels which took heavy toll; but their manner is the gentlest in the world when they tease a youngster or a high school miss; and their affection comes from way down deep when they meet a friend of long ago.

It's in the settlements by the forks of the creek, also, that the Ku Klux Klan has its warmest members and its bitterest foes.

This enmity creeps out most in elections, because Texas as a state takes its politics with just as passionate seriousness as its cities toil for business supremacy.

It's in Texas that you will hear the perfervid oratory and flag-waving that used to mark Fourth of July speaking everywhere. It's mostly sincere, by office-seekers and officeholders who would be only too glad to see deported anyone who for a moment questioned the motives of a Democratic president, or the infallibility of the American constitution, or the grandeur of the Stars and Stripes.

Texas never forgets, either (and has no reason for an instant to forget), its history.

Its name is Indian, from a tribe called Tejas by the Spanish. Its settlers were real pioneers, hardy, serious-minded men and women who followed Stephen F. Austin over a long trail into the territory when it was controlled by Spain.

The early Texans stood hardships better than the Mexicans. They dreamed of making it the empire it now is, instead of merely a wilderness of prairie and pine woods policed by Spain or Mexico. A bit of bad government and injustice by Mexican leaders was enough to start a revolution, although Austin to the last tried to keep faith with the Mexican government which had granted him the right to bring in settlers.

There was the Alamo, a heroic resistance in which every able defender of the San Antonio fort died; the Goliad massacre, the result of bad strategy against overwhelming numbers of Mexicans, and finally the battle of San Jacinto, near Houston, at which a small army of Americans under Sam Houston captured Santa Anna and routed his army.

Slavery and anti-slavery politics kept Texas from being admitted to the Union. By no means daunted, the early Texans set up a pretty good republic of their own. They finally joined the United States, but they did it just as much to help the United States as for any other sentiment.

Hence the independent spirit lingers in Texas. It shows in a firm refusal to concede anything to any other state.

On the other hand, there is here and there in the cities a bit of cream-puff aristocracy. Literary and musical clubs which pick up with amazing facility the patter of the New York Times book reviews and Deems Taylor's music writings. Lectures on everything from the New Pottery to the Home Life of Paracelsus are well attended, and there is generally a full house to greet a musician, and to applaud him no matter what his ability.

The big majority take to culture because it's highly fashionable; others because they can discourse on it; and still others after the manner of a serious college student trying hard to learn.

There is more than one regular attendant at Texas stock company theaters who really believes that in London or Boston he would be a riot—and who would wear a monocle if he dared. All this, mind you, on the same streets where ten years ago saloons and gambling joints fared free and easy, and where a gunman strolled into the sheriff's office and announced, "Gentlemen, I'll have to ask you to make bond for me until after the trial."

NOT CALIFORNIA, NOT THE RIVIERA, BUT HOUSTON, TEXAS

Old Spain left its heritage to Texans in part in the graceful design they favor for their homes in the residential districts. And the beauty fabricated by the brain and hand of man has a generous assistant in the rich soil and bright sunlight that nourish the palms with which wealthy citizens of Houston line their private promenades.

There are also coming to the front real men and women of genius—men and women who have lived through the early Texas days and can set them down for the enlightenment of future generations, or who can plan on a basis of genuine knowledge the fulfillment of a vision of a greater Texas.

Texas has still to clean up, in some places, its government, state, county, and city. But that has already progressed far—very far—from the time when city officials didn't bother to keep books, and the chief of police was a reformed bandit.

Texas is intensely conscious of itself. That is the mainspring of its progress. Citizen committees, luncheon clubs, chamber of commerce, work tooth and nail to boost their towns, not only by propaganda, but by real achievement.

Is it money? Let's form teams and get it all done in a big drive! Is it a transportation problem? Let's have a committee work with the mayor on it! Is it appropriation from Congress? Let's send a delegation up there to force it through!

So it goes.

Texas needs better transportation facilities. She needs better schools, better prison systems, a more simplified system of government. But Texas knows it. And hence before long Texas will get them.

The state's growth is really just starting. The present stage is like that backwoods youngster first testing his enormous biceps. He won't be a champion wrestler for a few years yet, but just wait!

Out in West Texas there are long reaches of flat prairie,—ranch country. In the north and to some extent in the far south the cattlemen are kings in their counties—jovial, open-handed men of the range.

You can still find cowboys in Texas, if you hunt hard. But if you have craved to see the dusty Main Street and the roulette wheel and the Polkadot Palace, you will have to get away off into the corners.

If you come to a Texas city you will find the Rotary Club and a Country Club in full sway, with golf tournaments on right along with salesmanship contests; a lot of busy people dodging autos in busy streets that aren't any different from the streets in Providence, R. I., or Syracuse, N. Y., people well paid and thrifty, living in attractive bungalows in the same kind of suburbs that people everywhere else in America are living in; and talking interestedly about whether it's going to rain tomorrow.

TEXAS WINDS HAVE WAVED THE FLAGS OF SIX NATIONS

By WEBB C. ARTZ

City Editor, San Antonio News

TEXAS, the pachyderm of the American Republic, the Big Brother of Uncle Sam's family, has witnessed the winds flaunt the flags of 6 Governments to the Heavens—the Insignia of Spain, the Lily of France, the Serpent of Mexico, the Star of the Texas Republic, the Bars of the Confederacy and the Stars and Stripes of a United Country.

History, rich tradition, love, veneration and hardship have contributed to the development of the great commonwealth which today inspired by its wonderful record throws open its doors and invites the old world to lift the latchstring and partake of its generous hospitality and welcome within the metropolis of Houston, a modern, wide-awake city which typifies the enterprise, energy, progress and human attainment that rules the State.

Rapidly becoming the South's greatest shipping center, Houston is a city of sentiment, of material development, of wealth and industrial accomplishment. It possesses every feature and concomitant of an up-to-date civilization. Cities and states. like persons, reveal character and history in their faces and Texas, child of Latin and Anglo Saxon struggle with primeval peoples and forces, has written her history in enduring stone, preserving her story with archaic structures which exist side by side with the modern temples of progress.

The romance of Castile pride, of the Southland, the industry of the Yankee, these have had their share in moulding an empire out of the vast wilderness. In San Antonio today stands the time battered belfries of the missions, whose bells 200 years ago summoned the sombre-garbed Franciscans, the Spanish soldiery and the laboring Indians to another day. In the heart of this quaint old city stands the Alamo, the cradle of Texas liberty, the Thermopylæ of the western hemisphere which had no messenger of defeat where a Mexican horde slaughtered 136 brave defenders firing the patriotism of pioneers and giving birth to a new Republic the symbols of six nations have swayed their rule over this stalwart land. In conflict of the Powers, for 155 strenuous years, Texas bled and recovered and bled again but it never knew the iron hand of a permanent conqueror. First came the expedition of Louis XIV in 1682. Hot on the heels of LaSalle came the Spaniard out of Mexico only to be driven back by the Mexicans who assumed control of the new country. Then came the tyranny of Santa Anna, the Alamo massacre and the retribution on San Jacinto battlefield outside the present city of Houston. The Lone Star of the Republic was born of sacrifice willingly hauled down at the annexation in 1845 replaced by the war-torn banner of the Confederacy for 4 years. The Stars and Stripes has since rippled majestically over Texas plain and forest. The magnitude of Texas is so great as to astound those who have never traversed the State. It has an area of 265,000 square miles and is larger that all the Atlantic states from Maine to Virginia. The British Isles could be dropped down in the palm of her gigantic plateaus and be lost in their vastness. Yet her population is only 5,000,000. There is enough land in Texas for the armies of the world to march around five abreast and leave a strip five by 20 feet for every man, woman and child in the United States. One does not belong to society as constituted in Texas unless his front door is 12 miles from his front gate. One rancher's house is 150 miles from his front gate and he is thinking of moving it back so he won't be bothered by passing automobiles.

To illustrate its immensity it is 150 miles further from El Paso to Texarkana, Texas, than from New York to Chicago, and Fort Worth, Texas, is nearer to St. Paul, Minn., than it is to Brownsville, Texas. Folks on the Sea Coast call people in Dallas Yankees and Pecos Valley ranchmen call East Texas farmers effete easterners. While Rio Grande Valley residents are picking oranges, citizens of Amarillo are shoveling snow off their sidewalks. This is Texas. King Cotton rules the Eastern half of her vast area. Prince petroleum is the heir apparent for black gold flows from mother Earth's bosom to place the State in the first rank as an oil producer. Greater still lowing herds graze in a thousand valleys and dot ten thousand hills to make a nation dependent upon Texas for its meat. Texas has had six flags floating above her. She now has the seventh fluttering aloft, the Standard of Prosperity.

GEOGRAPHERS TRICKED BY HOUSTON'S EAGER GENIUS

Ocean Vessels Now Ply from Former Inland City—Story of the Activity of One of America's Busiest Ports—Saw Three Million Tonnage Last Year

By BURT RULE
Houston Chamber of Commerce

One of the queens of the Compagnie Generale Transatlantique fleet, the S. S. Lafayette, entered Houston by the 30-foot ship channel recently. This improvement was completed to the point of utility, though not to that of Houston's ambition, in 1914, and betterments have been annually since the war. Over $30,000,000 has so far been expended to make Houston, 50 miles from the sea, one of the most important ports of the United States.

HOUSTON, TEXAS, is a city that tricked the geographers. This is not a fanciful literary expression but a statement that is borne out by facts. Situated more than 50 miles from the coastline of the Gulf of Mexico nevertheless today oceangoing vessels are regularly plying between Houston and the principal ports of the world.

Not so many years ago the average person living in a section of the United States other than the extreme Southwest and possessing a normal fund of geographical knowledge, thought of Houston as a fair-sized inland city located somewhere in South Texas. In 1924 recognition of Houston as a deepwater port extends from coast to coast and is rapidly finding root in the great shipping centers of the world.

The underlying cause of Houston's transformation from comparative obscurity to a position among the great ports of the nation has been the development of her deep waterway, the Houston Ship Channel. This strip of water which has brought the Gulf of Mexico to her door is Houston's medium of commercial communication with internationally important trade centers.

The possibilities of Houston as a port was realized by early Texas settlers and sailing craft navigated the old channel of Buffalo Bayou to the city of Houston in the eighteen thirties. In a report written by a civil engineer named George Stealey to General Sidney Sherman in 1846 it was recommended that a harbor be built on this waterway between the present sites of Houston and Harrisburg and the waterway developed to its fullest extent. In 1860 to 1875 the channel was used by Commodore Charles Morgan with a line of sidewheel steamers operating between New York and Clinton. The latter point is now a few miles below the present turning basin of the Houston Ship Channel and is almost in the center of the city's channel industrial district.

The federal government began its improvement program for the Houston Ship Channel in 1872 by dredging a cut in Galveston Bay. This work was followed by additional appropriations and further improvement construction by both the government and private interests until 1899 when a project was adopted for constructing a channel 25 feet in depth from the Gulf to Houston. A series of delays to the completion of this project, due to a great variety of causes, did not discourage the citizenship of Houston and Harris County who by this time were determined to see the fruition of their plans of many years for Houston as a maritime center.

The work was finally completed in 1914. The citizens of Harris County matched dollars with the federal government in the construction cost of this project. Immediately upon its completion business began to flow to the port of Houston. A coastwise line operating between Philadelphia and Houston was the first to make regular sailings. Oil refineries and other industries followed the inauguration of water traffic and established themselves on the banks of the ship channel.

On account of the world war, and Uncle Sam's later participation in it, a great part of the shipping of Gulf ports was diverted to the North Atlantic and during the period from 1914 to 1919 the development of the newly acquired port business of Houston was retarded, but by no means stopped.

The phenomenal increase of the city's maritime business from 1919 on is most impressively shown by the growth of the port's annual cotton exportations. The first exportation of this commodity from the port of Houston was made in November, 1919. The total exportation for that year was 45,341 bales. In 1920 the figures were 275,879; in 1921, 455,015; and in 1922, 771,894.

These are calendar years. Beginning in 1923 the exportation figures cover the cotton season or fiscal year which begins and ends in June. From June until December 31, 1923, 825,577 bales had been exported and at this writing the millionth bale has been passed.

Before this is printed Houston will have staged a big statewide celebration in honor of the exportation of the millionth bale and the eyes of the nation directed to this marvelous achievement.

The facts in a nutshell are that in less than four years Houston has increased her cotton exportations more than 250 per cent and has climbed into the enviable position of second cotton port in the world. And all of this in the face of the keenest kind of competition with old ports of the Gulf and South Atlantic!

Tonnage passing through the port of Houston during 1923 was 55 per cent greater than it was in 1922 and 126 per cent greater than the figures for 1921. Figures on the increase of tonnage are not more startling than those of the increase in valuation. These statistics covering the port's four years of exportation are:

Year	Value	Tonnage
1920	$72,967,344	714,261
1921	73,877,335	1,396,438
1922	136,959,620	2,027,927
1923	215,109,522	3,149,196

All worthwhile things are obtainable only at a cost of much time and effort, or the expenditure of much money. In the case of the acquirement of Houston's port facilities there was a liberal expenditure of both effort and money. We have already made mention of the time and effort contributed by the citizens of Harris County in the development of the Port of Houston. Now we'll say something about the money that was, and is being, spent for deepwater facilities.

On the improvement of her waterfront and for port terminals the city of Houston has already spent approximately $4,000,000. The voters of the county at a recent election accepted a bond issue for $4,000,000 for additional port facilities, such as docks and wharves, warehouses, rail trackage and shipside grain elevator.

The federal government has expended on the jetties in Galveston Bay which furnish the entrance to the ship channel, $11,515,796, and the government and the citizens of Harris county together have borne the cost of dredge work in the channel proper which amounted to approximately $9,000,000. Congress has agreed to appropriate $350,000 annually on maintenance of the channel. Further enlargement of the channel which is now nearing completion will cost the government $2,000,000.

So, to date Houston's port and harbor facilities have cost approximately $30,000,000 and there isn't a man, woman or child in all Harris County—and most of 'em are conversant on the subject—who won't tell you it was money well spent. In fact this sum does not represent money spent but money invested which is paying dividends to the city of Houston every day in the year.

The official dimensions of the channel when finally completed will be 30 feet depth all the way from the turning basin at the head of deepwater navigation in the city limits of Houston, by 150 feet bottom width, to Morgan's Point which marks the end of the channel before it enters the bay this side of the Gulf. The width across the bay is 250 feet.

The greater portion of the channel already has these dimensions. The largest vessels visiting ports of the Gulf and South Atlantic have been coming to Houston since 1919.

The Houston Chamber of Commerce recently demonstrated the adequacy of the port's facilities by chartering the S. S. Lafayette of the French Line and taking a party of Texans on a cruise to the West Indies. This vessel, which was diverted from the trans-Atlantic service for this special sailing, is 564 feet long and was the largest ship, passenger or freight-type, to enter a gulf port. She traversed the entire Houston Ship Channel four times without trouble of any kind.

FIRST PAN-AMERICAN PRESS MEET SCHEDULED FOR 1925

Newspaper Men of All Americas to Meet in Washington—Latin-America Boasts Brilliant Dailies—Survey of South American Journalism

By ERNESTO MONTENEGRO

THE Latin American Press is not a thing of yesterday. As far back as 1539, three-score years before Henry Hudson had ventured up the North River, a printing press had found its way to Mexico City, where others soon came to help in turning out religious tracts and sundry dissertations. By the time the Pilgrim Fathers had landed at Plymouth Rock, the printing presses of Lima, Peru, were already outworn with 40 years constant issuing of leaflets setting forth the miracles of local healers and the gross satirical pieces of creole poets. Franklin had not yet learned in his brother's printing shop what a "pi" looked like, when the Jesuits carried the press up the Plata River to their remote Missions in Paraguay.

At the beginning of the last century, the anonymous printed sheet exerted a powerful influence in spreading the revolutionary gospel throughout the Spanish American colonies, and so it is not surprising to find that many of the leading figures of the independence period were militant journalists. It is also worth recording, for instance, that one of the first decisions of the autonomous government of Chile, was a decree which sent a commissioner to the United States "to buy 4,500 fire-lock arms and one printing press." This mixed ammunition reached Chile in good order in 1812, the latter being in charge of three American citzens, printers by profession, whose names were: Samuel B. Johnston, William H. Burbidge and Simon Garrison.

Apparently at least, the Press has something to do with the success or failure of International Conferences. In consequence, the men who have followed the delegates of their respective countries to the different capitals of the New World where Pan American Congresses have gathered during the last decades, very naturally have come to the conclusion that it wouldn't be a bad thing for them to meet for purposes of their own. In this way the Pan American Press Conference to be held in Washington in the early summer of 1925 has become incorporated in the program of special non-political reunions which have been slated to take place between two of the main political Conferences.

For the first time in America a body of newspaper workers, made up of representatives of the great dailies published in English, Spanish or Portuguese, from New York to Buenos Aires, will come together. It will be a far more significant affair than was the visit of a group of Mexican journalists to Washington during the Wilson administration, or the presence of the few American correspondents at the Pan American Conference in Santiago de Chile last year.

Even as the Latin American newspapermen visiting the United States will be offered the opportunity to ascertain that all the American press is not a bundle of yellow journalism or a mere collection of advertisements with "fills" of sensational reading matter, so will the American delegates find that there are in Latin America many journalists of world culture, serving some of the most alert, neatly presented and best informed daily newspapers in the world.

Some newspapers of Latin America, such as the Rio Janeiro Jornal do Commercio, enjoy the distinction of being the most literary, the best written dailies in any language, except the French; others, as El Mercurio of Chile, have been chronicling almost from the very beginning, that is, for a whole century, the life of the country; a newspaper of the type of La Nacion of Buenos Aires makes its pages a meeting place for a most distinguished array of international contributors, while in the same Argentine Republic, La Prensa attains a circulation running into the quarter million copies and has established free public services such as a medical clinic, an agricultural bureau and lectures by specialists on sundry subjects.

Between the zone of modern, up-to-date journalism in Argentina, Brazil and Chile, and the great newspapers of Mexico and Cuba, there are to be sure some stagnant waters, where illiteracy, widely scattered population or political and economic unsteadiness have impeded the progress of the public press. In some of the tropical countries the newspaper is still in the one man mouthpiece stage, dealing almost exclusively with party affairs, if not entirely handled by versifying and society reporters. Venezuela has at present one single metropolitan newspaper, issued mainly for the purpose of recording the goings and comings of the "great man" of the day.

To sum up, the main bulk of the South American press may be classified thus: the Brazilian papers are the most literary; the Argentine the most cosmopolitan; the Uruguayan the most combative; the Chilean the most sober in tone. As to the Central American newspapers, it is in them that the long-looked-for Federation is realized, for newspapers as El Diario del Salvador or El Repertorio Americano, de Costa Rica, are truly organs of the best elements in the 5 countries.

While the Mexican newspaper is perhaps the most widely read by all classes, considering the various elements of the population, the Cuban newspaper is the most Americanized of them all. In Havana, Mexico City, Panama and Valparaiso, there is at least one local newspaper printing a page in English, but the Cuban paper is the only one which frankly begins the process of intermixing the English and Spanish language outside of the sporting page.

If there is any sharp distinction between the average American and Latin American newspaper, it will be based in the difference in communicativeness of one and the other race. While the American newspaper as a rule has more resources, more reporters and makes a more liberal use of telephone and telegraph lines to cover the field, the Latin American newspaper office on the contrary is a social center in every sense of the word. Public and editors are in familiar contact, strangers drop in for news or a bit of gossip, and even concerts and lectures are offered in their well appointed halls and reception rooms. The newspaper there means more to the populace, for libraries are little more than archives for specialists, and means of communication are limited.

Another difference is found in the fact that the privacy of the individual, his home and personal conduct are let alone, by the Latin American newspaper, provided he or she may have some social standing, however little. The majority of the Latin American journalists will volunteer a step further by withholding the name of a person from any item of general interest whenever it is considered that his social or commercial standing may suffer. And woe to the transgressor of these social conventions, for even in the largest cities there is no newspaper or newspaper owner powerful enough to fly in the face of convention and cater to the sensationally inclined portion of the public. The Spanish love for the outward form of courtesy must count in part for that, for I remember having read in a Chilean newspaper the following item in

SURPRISES AWAIT WORLD'S ADVERTISERS WHO VISIT TEXAS NEXT YEAR

By Harry R Drummond

THE annual conventions of The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World have a distinct educational advantage to all who attend, and this is as it should be.

In holding the 1923 convention at Atlantic City many good Englishmen gained first-hand information regarding the United States and were greatly benefited thereby.

In holding the 1924 convention in London, many American advertising men have been given an opportunity to gain first-hand information regarding England and English business methods.

In holding the 1925 convention in Houston, Texas, both British and American advertising men will have an opportunity to gain first-hand knowledge about one of the greatest markets on earth, and a market that has just begun to expand.

There is no denying the fact that there are many cities throughout the world that can present many advantages, but the claims of Houston are so varied, so potent and so patent that they are worthy of earnest consideration by the delegates, in convention assembled in London.

In the first place Houston wants the convention — only "want" is an inadequate word with which to describe the longing Houston confesses.

Houston is not alone in wanting this convention. Texas wants Houston to have it; for Houston is, after all, just a part of Texas, and it is customary for all of Texas to join any part of Texas in desires of this character.

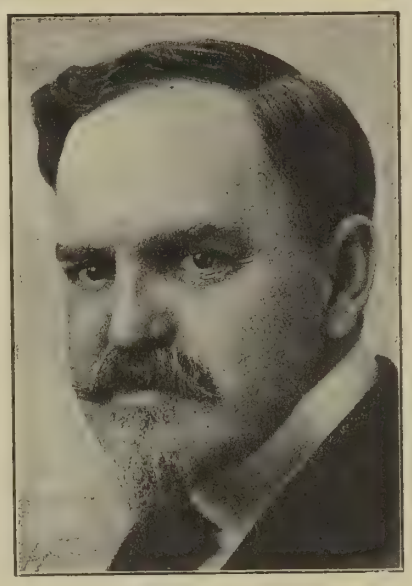
Houston, as a representative city of Texas, offers not only adequate convention facilities and entertainment, but, being one of the hub cities of the state, presents opportunities for the study of markets and potential markets which will be of inestimable educational advantage to every delegate.

Before considering Houston as a city, let us give a glance at Texas—the Texas of today, the market—what it has to offer and what it will have to offer in the near future.

Texas is the largest state in the Union, containing 265,896 square miles.

Elaborating on this statement it might be in order to say that Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachussets, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, West Virginia, South Carolina, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, and the District of Columbia might all be placed within the state of Texas, and still leave 3,310 square miles of unoccupied territory.

The 1920 government census gave Texas 4,663,228 people, of which 3,557,646 were native born white, 360,519 foreign born whites and 745,063 negroes.



Out of this, 840,805 people live in the largest cities of the state. These cities are scattered over this vast territory, being built up as trading centers of territory that produces tremendous wealth, and, from a production standpoint, is still in its infancy.

Texas offers more in the way of surprises, pleasant surprises, than does any other state in the Union.

From an educational standpoint, a standpoint of profitable education, Houston presents legitimate, concrete reasons why the 1925 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World should go to Houston in preference to any other city asking for the honor.

And, with Houston's bid for the convention, goes the good will and promise of co-operation from San Antonio, Dallas, Galveston, Wichita Falls, and the other good cities of Texas which promise that, if given an opportunity, they will supplement Houston's entertainment by giving "shows" that will make the side trips worth while.

Much of the supposed pioneer picturesqueness of Texas is merely in history. Texas, taken by and large, is about as picturesque as is Ohio, or Indiana, or

HARRY R. DRUMMOND

Illinois, or any other middle western state. Texas is practical. Texas is up-to-date. Texas is a state that, except for size, is on par with almost any other agricultural state.

At to Texas' resources, its productivity, which, after all, is the test of its market potentialities, last year's reports show that the state produced $1,064,775,000 worth of agricultural products, $315,000,000 worth of live stock and 125,000,000 barrels of crude oil and the mineral production brings the total production of Texas up to $1,500,000,000 which would give each and every citizen a trifle more that $319 dollars to spend.

It might be mentioned in passing that it is not quite equally divided, and some Texans get more than $319 annually for expenses.

And, in considering this, it is also well to mention that, in producing these great crops 27,923,000 acres of Texas were cultivated, leaving 142,252,440 acres uncultivated, and 142,252,440 acres equals something like 222,270 square miles uncultivated as against 43,628 square miles under cultivation.

All this means that, with but one-sixth of the state under the plow and $319 produced for every man, woman and child in the estate in a year, when the other five-sixths of the land produce there will be some market in Texas.

Texas, because of its size, cannot be centralized as a market. Great jobbing houses with headquarters, say, in New York, have branches in Chicago, St. Louis, Denver, Atlanta and other points. It is just as logical, from a mileage point of view, to have branch houses in, say, Dallas, Houston and El Paso—all in Texas, to be sure, but so far distant, one from another, that they are each strategic points of distribution.

By the same token it is utterly foolish to consider Texas climatically as a whole, for Texas climate differs greatly.

While San Antonio and Galveston are ideal Winter resorts, the Texas Northers, which happen along now and then in the Northeastern part of the state, can and do make the Lake George region of Northern New York appear even as Palm beach by comparison.

Texas is big, Texas is diversified. Texas is alive and Texas is one of the greatest undeveloped markets in the world—not undeveloped, perhaps, but partially developed, a market that every advertising man, no matter what his product may be, should see and know—know with first-hand knowledge, for only through first-hand knowledge can he know it as he should know it.

The Southern Pacific

From Ocean to Ocean

THE one great trans-continental transportation system of America operating over its own lines from New York on the Atlantic, to Portland, Oregon, on the Pacific, with direct rails from New Orleans, Beaumont, Orange, Port Arthur, Galveston, Texas City and Houston (the Mexican Gulf ports), thru San Antonio and El Paso, Texas, the States of New Mexico and Arizona, with terminals at Los Angeles, San Francisco and Sacramento in California, and at Ogden and Salt Lake City, Utah, and with its own rail connections to the more important cities of these States.

Owning the largest and finest coastwise fleet in the United States, comprising thirty-five steamers operating between New York, New Orleans and Galveston.

Owning and operating 19,092 miles of track segregated between 11,223 miles of main line, 614 miles of second or double track, 4376 miles of sidings, 2119 miles of track used by solely controlled companies, and 760 miles used jointly by controlled corporations.

Owning and operating 2119 locomotives, 2571 passenger train cars, 55,066 revenue freight cars, and 4953 work train equipment.

As of December 31st, 1923, the capital stock of the Southern Pacific Company was $344,380,905; that of its proprietary corporations $346,832,400, a total of $691,213,305.

Total gross revenue for 1923 was $287,204,634.
Total expense of operation was...$207,166,588.
Net operating revenue was .....$ 54,228,023.

The Southern Pacific has paid six per cent annually on its capital stock without intermission for nearly twenty years and has never forfeited an obligation.

The total employees of the system and its affiliated properties number nearly 90,000 persons.

The total assets of the Southern Pacific Company and proprietary companies as of December 31st, 1923, was $1,934,513,605.20.

An interesting feature of the operation of the company in its relation to the welfare of the employees, is the maintenance of a permanent pension system, an elaborate hospital and medical service department and a group insurance plan under which over $110,000,000 of policies were written, the company providing part free insurance and contributing to the cost of the remainder.

THE Southern Pacific System had its inception when, on January 8th, 1863, work was begun on the line of the Central Pacific Railroad from Sacramento, California, in its epoch making drive across the giant Sierras that it might clasp hands with the rail lines then building from the Missouri and Mississippi Valleys Westward toward the Pacific. The rails of the Central and Union Pacific roads were joined at Promontory, Utah, May 10th, 1869, and the dream of Huntington, Stanford, Crocker and Hopkins, the four men to whose pertinacity, faith and resolution the project had been made of accomplishment, was realized. In 1883, the East and West were again united, this time via the Gulf of Mexico, the Southern Pacific building West thru Texas and East thru Arizona and New Mexico, the rails joining upon the West Texas elevations and the Southern route from the Atlantic to Pacific consummated.

History was made on the two memorable occasions, and because of the courage and vision of a few men the Southern Pacific is today one of the forward transportation systems of a great country with an unquestioned integrity and a service equal to the demands of a growing and progressive nation.

'ENUS-LIKE, GALVESTON ROSE FROM THE SEA AND NOW LIVES BY IT

domitable People and Engineers Have Made It Impossible for Another Flood to Destroy City, the Second Port in America

By I. D. McMASTER

Secretary Galveston Chamber of Commerce

N 1918 a French adventurer, Jean La-Fitte, established headquarters on lveston Island for the purpose of car-ng on a private warfare with his anish Majesty. From this strategic int his fleet of ships swooped down on the gold-laden Spanish galleons and vought havoc with that nation's trade the new world. But ten years later e westward march of Americans forced s intrepid mariner to remove his opera-ns to the West Indies.

The things that caused LaFitte, the ategist, to select Galveston as a base, e the primary causes for the success of e port and are largely responsible for reputation as a resort. These were e items of location and of climate with of attendant advantages. For the port ll stands out as one of the leaders in ltin-American trade and the city has ained for itself an enviable reputation a Summer and Winter resort.

Where the famous LaFitte commune as established slightly more than a ntury ago there now stands a city, that lds nearly every worth-while maritime cord in the country. In addition to is achievement it has gained fame as watering place, and is by no means un-lown as an industrial center. The his-ry of the storm of 1900 is known to ost people, but few can realize that e people of this city, by building a gantic seawall and raising the level of e ground above any possible danger of od, have forever prevented a recurrence this event.

There are few places which can boast the wealth of history and romance hich surrounds the Island city. Named r a Spanish viceroy, founded by a rench explorer, and settled by a French venturer who has often been called a rate; all these and more fell to the lot Galveston in those early days. It itnessed and aided in the struggle r liberty which Texans waged against e tyrannies of Mexico. Here people ept or cursed over the fate of the lamo and here the president of the in-nt republic received the news of the ctory at San Jacinto.

But, while its people take pride in the orious history of the town, they are vertheless more interested in its eco-mic aspect. Galveston has always been commercial center. From the begin-ng, the small ships of the early 19th ntury came as close inshore as possible, ghtering their contents for transport to the state either by small boat or ox teams.

But these days are gone and now Gal-ston has one of the finest harbors in e country, capable of receiving hun-eds of the largest ships and handling nually a volume of business aggregat-g nearly $1,000,000,000. The total lume of foreign business, exports and ports, shows Galveston as ranking cond only to New York, and with a mmanding lead over New Orleans, hiladelphia and the other prominent orts. It is served by four trunk line ilways, which, with their connections, ach every section of the Southwest.

Galveston leads the ports of the nation the export of cotton. An average of ore than 3,000,000 bales, about half of e total exports of the country, find their ay through this port to the markets of e world every year. It is also the prin-ipal sulphur exporting port and handles normous quantities of oil, lumber, spel-r, cottonseed products and many other mmodities. The imports consist princi-ally of raw sugar, crude oil, sisal, coffee nd various novelties from the Orient.

The port holds every record for quick rnaround of ships, cargo dispatch and release of car equipment. The average detention of freight cars is less than 3 days. Sulphur, grain and oil ships load in less than a day. Even cotton, which requires a great amount of hand labor, is handled much more quickly here than at other ports. The labor is also more efficient, getting the maximum use of the cargo space aboard a vessel.

The physical properties are among the finest in the country, and the plan on which they have been developed is a marvel of convenience and efficiency. The port is closer to the open sea than any other natural harbor in the country. Steamers leaving any dock in the harbor can be on the high seas within 45 minutes after casting off. There are no tortuous channels to traverse, or other conditions which tend to make inland navigation so hazardous to big steamships.

There is an indescribable charm, a tropical atmosphere, about Galveston that one would hardly expect to find in a North American community. A visitor is impressed with the difference immediately on arrival and a long sojourn merely serves to accentuate the feeling. The city was made for pleasure, but it is very different from the usual pleasure resort. There is the hurry and bustle that you will find in every wide-awake American community but it is softened and tempered by the general surroundings and things are done without the hullabaloo so characteristic of other communities.

The facilities for pleasure are superior to those of most resorts. The surf bathing is called "the finest in the world," not without reason. Splendid golf links and tennis courts have been provided. Hunting and fishing are excellent. Riding and motoring are favorite pastimes, the long stretches of hard packed sand on the beaches forming a beautiful background for both.

With all the advantages outlined, the people have not tried to escape their greatest responsibility: the comfort of their guests. Splendid hotels have been built and equipped, whose management take pride in the appointments and cuisine of their houses. The people generally are hospitable and the tourist is made to feel at home at all times.

And the city is forging ahead in every department. The port is well established and growing in importance every year. Industrial plants of national fame have headquarters here and the praises of the resort are being sung in all ports of the country.

Verily Galveston is a good place to come to and a better place to live in.

"Good to the Last Drop"

GEOGRAPHERS TRICKED BY HOUSTON

In addition to Houston's publicly owned terminals private corporations have built wharves on the waterfront to handle their shipments. Shipping facilities of considerable magnitude have been constructed by oil refineries and cotton compresses located on the ship channel. One cotton and warehouse company has constructed a warehouse with a storage space of 12 acres and a capacity of 100,000 bales of cotton. At the wharf of this plant four ocean going vessels can be handled at one time.

Cotton from the port of Houston is shipped direct to Liverpool, Hamburg, Bremen, Barcelona, Havre, Genoa, Manchester, Ghent, Antwerp, Rotterdam and other ports of the European continent. Outbound cargoes consists of cotton, grain, lumber, refined oil, flour, cottonseed meal and cake, staves, naval stores, scrap iron, oil well supplies, farm implements, dairy products and other commodities originating in the Southwest.

Inbound cargoes consists largely of crude oil, coffee, bones, molasses, sugar, sisal and manufactured articles from Eastern seaboard via coastwise lines for distribution throughout the territory served by the seventeen railway lines which "meet the sea" at Houston.

The port is served with coastwise lines to Philadlephia, Pacific Coast points and New Orleans. A recent ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission permits the entrance of the Morgan Line into the port of Houston with service to New York and other points on the Atlantic seaboard. Efforts are now being made to develop sufficient tonnage for this line to justify commencement of service in the very near future.

On lines to foreign ports regular sailings are made to many ports of Continental Europe, the British Isles, West Indies, Mexico, South America and Australia. The port has an interior waterway line to Corpus Christi via the Intracoastal Canal and several of the large oil refineries on the channel operate fleets of tankers from Mexico to their Houston plants and thence to all destinations with cargoes of refined oil products.

With a view to the systematic development and undisturbed control of her port affairs, the city of Houston took advantage of an Act of the state Legilature of 1913 and extended her corporate limits to include the channel down to its entrance into Galveston Bay, a distance of about 50 miles. These limits also include a territory along the banks of the channel extending 2,500 feet from the center of the waterway.

The city has not the power of taxation over this area but possesses all police powers.

The citizens of Harris County of which Houston is the county seat voted in 1922 to transfer jurisdiction of harbor affairs from the municpality to the Houston and Harris County Navigation and Canal Commission. The personnel of the Commission consists of represetatives from both the city and county and chairman elected by both groups.

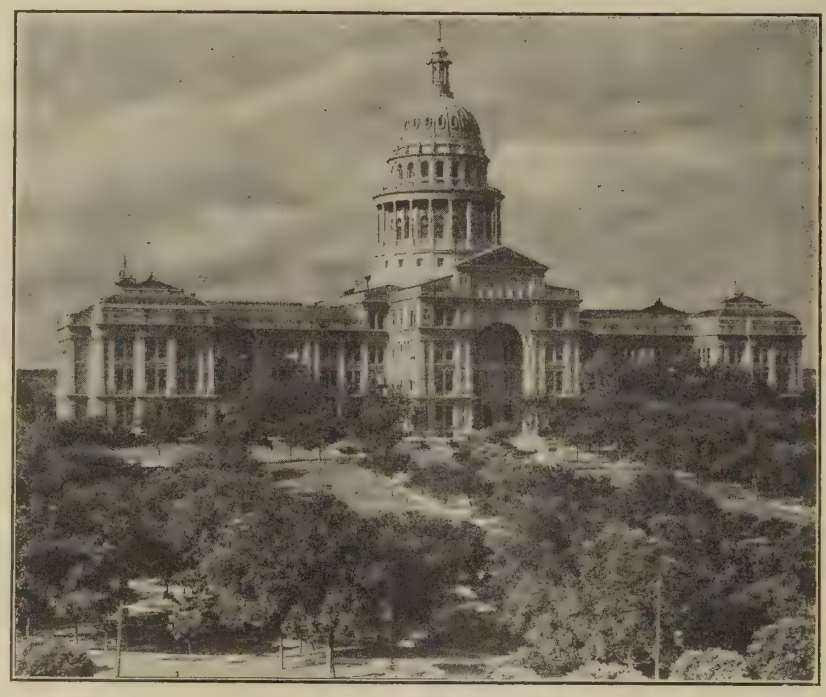
A story on the Houston Ship Channel would not be complete without mention being made of the wonderful industrial development that has taken place on the banks of the waterway since the establishment of water commerce. There are 50 miles of available water frontage for industrial locations along the Houston Ship Channel of which not more than eight miles have been improved. And yet see what has been done in the short space of five years!

At the present time on the main channel there are 45 industries with an estimated capital investment of $43,000,000. The daily pay roll for channel industries amounts to $15,600. To these figures can be justifiably added the Goose Creek oil field, which is on the channel, with a further investment of $50,000,000 and a pay roll of $10,000 per day.

There are nine oil refineries in operation on the Houston Ship Channel. Other channel industries consist of chemical works, flour mill, cement plant, ammunition plant, fertilizer works, molasses refinery, oil and coal bunkering plants and cotton compresses and warehouses.

In addition to these plants there are 22 industries located on the upper or light-draft channel above the turning basin, with a total invested capital of approximately $11,000,000 and a daily pay roll of $3,300. This gives the channel industrial area a grand total of capital invested of nearly $105,000,000 and pay roll of $29,000 per day. Then there is a list of 12 industries, including improvement work authorized for the Navigation Commission, which when completed will represent an additional outlay of $26,500,000.

In order to provide adequate and economical power for these industries and the others which are to come, the Houston Lighting and Power Company, is constructing a huge electric plant which will cost $10,000,000. When all the units are in this will be the largest electrical plant in the South.



A railway belt line with approximately 30 miles of track serves most of the industries on the south side of the channel. The line will be extended down the south side to Morgan's Point, and on the north side a considerable distance, involving about 25 miles of additional construction. When this is done the belt railway will parallel the channel so as to serve all industries in the district and they will then have deepwater transportation facilities at their front doors and at their back doors direct rail connection with Houston's seventeen railways.

The success of the port of Houston is due almost entirely to the energy, enthusiasm and never-say-die-spirit of her citizens. It was this spirit that prompted hard-boiled congressmen to vote for the appropriations that made the digging of the Houston Ship Channel possible. These watch-dogs of the treasury were guided by the well-founded theory that he who had faith in himself and is willing to demonstrate this faith in a practical fashion, is worth helping. The people of Houston and Harris County stuck to their dream of a world port through thick and thin and in spite of seemingly unsurmountable handicaps and when the time came to ask the government for money they demonstrated their confidence in their proposition by matching Uncle Sam dollar for dollar.

This Houston spirit is impressively defined by Paul W. Brown, editor and publisher of America At Work, who came to Houston to see what we had done here. This is what he wrote about the Houston people:

> About a decade ago Houston came to the belief that she had everything necessary to the operation of a successful seaport but the sea—that was at Galveston 50 miles away. To a community of but ordinary vision and capabilities this lack would have appeared fatal; to the mind of Houston it appeared to be more or less of a detail. Did not Buffalo Bayou, narrow and crooked, wriggle its way into the heart of Houston? Why should not ships come up from Buffalo Bayou? Surely the only trouble was that it was not wide enough or deep enough; and the proper amount of digging would speedily remedy that. Had not Manchester dug a ship canal that brought the commerce of the Atlantic in from Liverpool? True, when Manchester dug her ship canal she had six times as many people as Houston, and the Manchester canal was 35½ miles, as against about 54 miles for the Houston canal—but these again were details. The people of Manchester had of course been deprived of the advantages that result from living in Texas; so Houston in the midst of her fields 50 miles from the nearest deep water, proceeded to create her port. There is just one comment on the wisdom of the plan and that comment is supplied by its success. She created, nor is her achievement what the French call SUCCES D' ESTIME. The port of Houston meets the test which the late Professor James imposed upon philosophy: it works. Thus purely artificial harbor half a hundred miles inland is already the second cotton port of the United States.

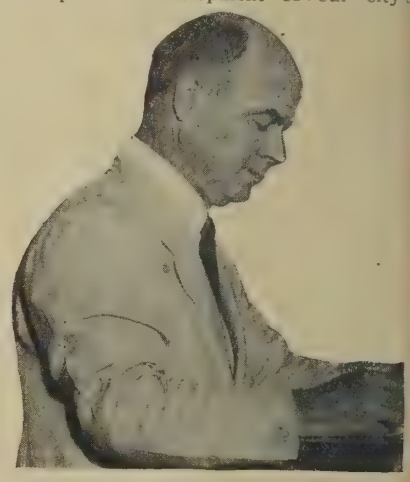
HOUSTON HAS EVERY REQUIREMENT FOR A.A.C.W. CONVENTION CITY



By HON. DANIEL F. GARETT
United States Representative from Houston

HOUSTON with hotel facilities equal or greater than any city in the Southwest and an auditorium seating 10,000 persons is particularly well-equipped to handle the next annual convention of the Advertising Clubs of the World. Among the features of Houston that entitle the city to serious consideration are its ship channel to the sea and the fact that the city has 17 railroads. Its people are the most hospitable to be found anywhere. The short distance to the Gulf coast by the ship channel, excellent roads or hourly interurban service offers another attraction to visitors.

"THE LATCH-STRING IS OUT"

By E. A. PEDEN
Chairman, Port Commission of Houston

EVERYONE in our good City of Houston is equally impressed with the splendid development of our city's port and channel facilities, and the importance of the 1925 Advertising Association's Convention here, "where 17 railroads meet the sea."

Just as Houston has the proud record of having initiated the 50-50 method of waterway development with Federal aid, and as she first pioneered prevention of private monopoly of ship docking and warehouse auxiliaries, so is our citizenship anxious to pioneer new impetus to the splendid work of the Associated Advertising Clubs for meeting again in the States, following your successful meeting in London.

The "latch-string is always out" in Houston and a particular welcome will be extended to the "Princes of Publicity" next summer.

Come and know us and let us know you!

E. A. PEDEN, Chairman,
Port Commission of Houston.

"Consistently Splendid Progress"

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—"The world moves. When the sun sets, today has become another yesterday and all matters regarding which man should be informed are changing constantly."

The above quotation aptly applies to the EDITOR & PUBLISHER and to the consistently splendid progress which has been recorded under your management during the past 12 years, and may I be among many to congratulate you in all heartiness in the celebration of your 12th anniversary as publisher and inspirational head of the EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

It has been said and truly that the measure of power is growth, and by this token growth, big, sure and sane, will be progressively achieved by the EDITOR & PUBLISHER through the coming years.

More power always to you and your associates.

COFFEE MEN CHOOSE NEWSPAPERS FOR NATION-WIDE AD DRIVE

General Magazines Excluded from Co-operative Educational Campaign Now Being Planned to Include 150 Dailies —N. W. Ayer & Son Preparing Schedules

By HYMAN BLUMBERG

ABOUT 150 newspapers throughout the country are listed in the advertising schedule for 1924 of the Joint Coffee Trade Publicity Committee of the United States. But in marked contrast to the campaigns of previous years not a single general magazine is included for this year.

Felix Coste, secretary-manager of the committee, does not divulge the reasons for the exclusion of general magazines from the current campaign. He explains, merely, that circumstances peculiar to the coffee industry do not warrant the use of general magazines just now. To the student of advertising, and especially to the prospective individual or co-operative advertiser, the fact is significant that here is another organization that has discovered another reason why the general magazine should be dropped in favor of the more localized newspaper.

As an aid to the newspaper campaign two trade journals, the Tea and Coffee Trade Journal and The Spice Mill, several drug and fountain periodicals, a dozen medical publications, a magazine devoted to educators, and a half-dozen booklets, will reach specified groups of readers.

The campaign will divide itself into two divisions—the spring schedule and the fall schedule. The slant will be purely an educational one. Copy will bespeak the high quality of beverage coffee, and will take the positive stand that coffee, as determined by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which spent 3 years and $40,000 investigating disputed questions and traditions regarding the matter, is not an injurious beverage for the great mass of human beings, "but, on the contrary, the history of human experience, as well as the results of scientific experimentation point to the fact that coffee is a beverage, which properly prepared and rightly used, gives comfort and inspiration, augments mental and physical activity, and may be regarded as the servant rather than the destroyer of civilization."

N. W. Ayer & Son are directing the campaign. Exact schedules for 1924 have not yet been completed, so that definite information as to the space to be used is not available. On the average, however, advertisements will appear in the newspapers once a week, and will cover 30 inches, running two and three columns wide, and 15 or 10 inches long respectively. Position has been obtained on news pages in preference to food and women's pages, as the copy is to be of general news and educational interest.

A booklet outlining the entire campaign will go to the advertising offices of each newspaper in which advertisements are to appear. At the same time these newspapers will receive matrices of advertisements with copy suggestions for local advertisers. This will enable the newspapers to increase local lineage, and will also give the adjacent coffee distributors an opportunity to take full advantage of the committee's campaign. An understanding has been reached with the newspapers that local advertisers may appear on the same page as the campaign copy, but not adjoining columns.

The campaign is international, in that the growers of Brazil have joined hands with the manufacturers and distributors in the United States. Funds are obtained from both sources, that from Brazil being diverted into magazine and newspaper advertising and that from the States being employed for auxiliary purposes of office management and routine, and other forms of publicity.

The history of the Joint Coffee Trade Publicity Committee is interesting as a basis of comparison with its present efforts.

The idea of a national trade movement to advertise coffee originated in 1910, in the minds of a few roasters in the Middle West. These men formed a local organization that soon developed into the National Coffee Roasters Association. Today this organization numbers more than 300 members.

From the beginning it was recognized that to be effective a campaign must be backed jointly by growers and distributors, since both would receive equal benefit from any resulting increase in consumption. Brazil, the source of two-thirds of the world's coffee, was the logical ally and an appeal was made to the planters of that country. In 1912 a party of ten leading roasters and importers visited Brazil at the invitation of the national government. The planters of the State of Sao Paulo, who produce more than one-half of all the coffee used in the United States, were first to appreciate the idea. After their attempts to interest the national government failed, they founded the Sociedade Promotora da Defesa do Cafe (Society to Promote the Consumption of Coffee) and had a law passed taxing every bag of coffee shipped from the plantations of that state in a period of 4 years. This tax, amounting to 100 reis per bag, or about two and a half cents United States money at even exchange rates, is collected by the railroads from the shippers and turned over to the Sociedade.

H. C. HOWARD

As President of the Advertising Association of Houston, he led the band of Texans who made it "London, 1924; Houston, 1925."

In the United States the supervision of the advertising was delegated to 5 men, representing both the importing and the roasting branches of the trade, and designated as the Joint Coffee Trade Publicity Committee of the United States. Three of these committee men, Ross W. Weir, of New York; F. J. Ach, of Dayton, Ohio, and George S. Wright, of Boston, are roasters, and two, William Bayne, Jr., and C. H. Stoffregen, both of New York, are importers and jobbers, or "green coffee men." The committee organized with Mr. Weir as chairman.

It was estimated that the Sao Paulo tax on the basis of the existing crop would produce about a quarter of a million dollars a year. This money is sent in monthly installments to the Joint Coffee Trade Publicity Committee. To date, this fund has netted about $1,000,000.

ADVERTISING IS SOUND INVESTMENT McQUISTON TELLS GEAR MEN

As Important to Industry As the Tools in the Workshops —Advises Budget System and Full Year's Trial

By J. C. McQUISTON

Manager, Department of Publicity, Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co.

ADVERTISING is much misunderstood, and many misconceptions exist concerning its functions. It may be fortunate that many people think of advertising, and talk as though they knew a lot about advertising, but it is equally unfortunate that very few have the attitude toward advertising which results in constructive thought and definite action.

I propose that we shall consider advertising as a real bona fide investment, for which we should spend our money as we spent it for tools in our factories, with the idea that it performs its functions just as definitely and just as surely as do the tools we buy. In many respects we might consider advertising as a part of our tool equipment, for it is a very effective tool when properly used.

Two fundamentals mark a good investment—safety of capital invested, and rate of return on the investment.

If I were investing capital in a business, I would investigate very carefully these two features. I would wish to know that the property is worth the price asked. I would wish to know that there was a market for my produce, at prices which would assure me a good return on my investment. But if it were an old well-established business, I should find it necessary to pay for something additional, usually listed under the caption of "good will."

This term covers an item, the value of which is unquestioned, and yet hard to fix. It may be considered as representing the investment in advertising made by those conducting the business. If this investment has been made with the care that should accompany the making of wise investments, the first of our fundamentals has been realized, for here is our capital invested in such a way that it has a real tangible value which can be realized if we wish to dispose of the business.

The second fundamental of an investment is that it shall give a reasonable return on the capital invested, and considering advertising again we can translate this into additional sales.

Having shown that advertising contains the fundamental requirements of a good investment, let us consider what is necessary to make our advertising measure up to these requirements.

If we are wise when investing financially, we will consult our banker and be governed by his expert advice.

The same wisdom is not always shown by the business man who decides to do some advertising, but it is true nevertheless that there are experts available in this field who can guide us with as much judgment as the banker exhibits in the financial field.

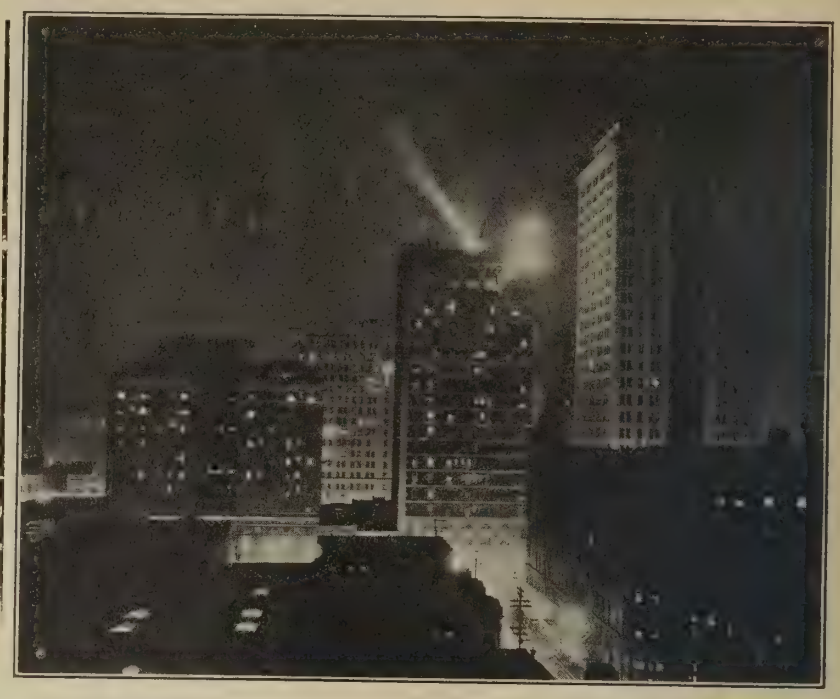
Our advice to the beginner in advertising is to get all the expert advice possible, and not to take unproven any information that may be handed him.

To make your advertising a safe investment, you must be a close student of business conditions.

You must know your own business thoroughly, better than any other person.

In addition to knowing your own business, you should study its relations to general business conditions, and thus get its proper perspective in the world of business.

With this fundamental preparation, consisting of a knowledge of your own business and its proper relation to business in general, you are ready to approach the investment in advertising.



Of course we wish our investment to be safe and we wish it to bring returns. This implies that we must make the investment studiously and cautiously.

Again I recommend that the advice of an authority of this form of business investment be consulted.

Make your plans at least one year in advance. One year is none too long for this purpose. It is hardly worth while to plan for a shorter period. Your total investment may look big, and in the beginning your plan may seem somewhat involved. It is important, however, that

SOLVING AD PROBLEMS ON MAIN STREET TAKES AUDACITY AND QUICK WIT

Solicitor Finds Way to "Sell" Merchant While Latter Talks With Customer—How Live Copy Moved Idle Stock

By EDGAR WHITE

THERE is an unwritten law among traveling salesmen and advertising men who seek business along Main street that a merchant must not be interrupted while he is talking with a customer. Many merchants who work at the counter will not even look at the solicitor if they are engaged. I've been working on a time limit, and meeting a merchant by appointment to get his ad, and have had to wait all the way from 15 minutes to half an hour while he was talking with a customer about the weather or crops. And that despite the fact that the boys in the ad room were feverishly awaiting the copy to get the ad in the first edition. It would relieve the situation immensely if the merchant would merely say: "Busy now; will run that ad tomorrow."

But in the vast majority of cases, he simply ignores the solicitor, and would resent the slightest remark while talking with his customer.

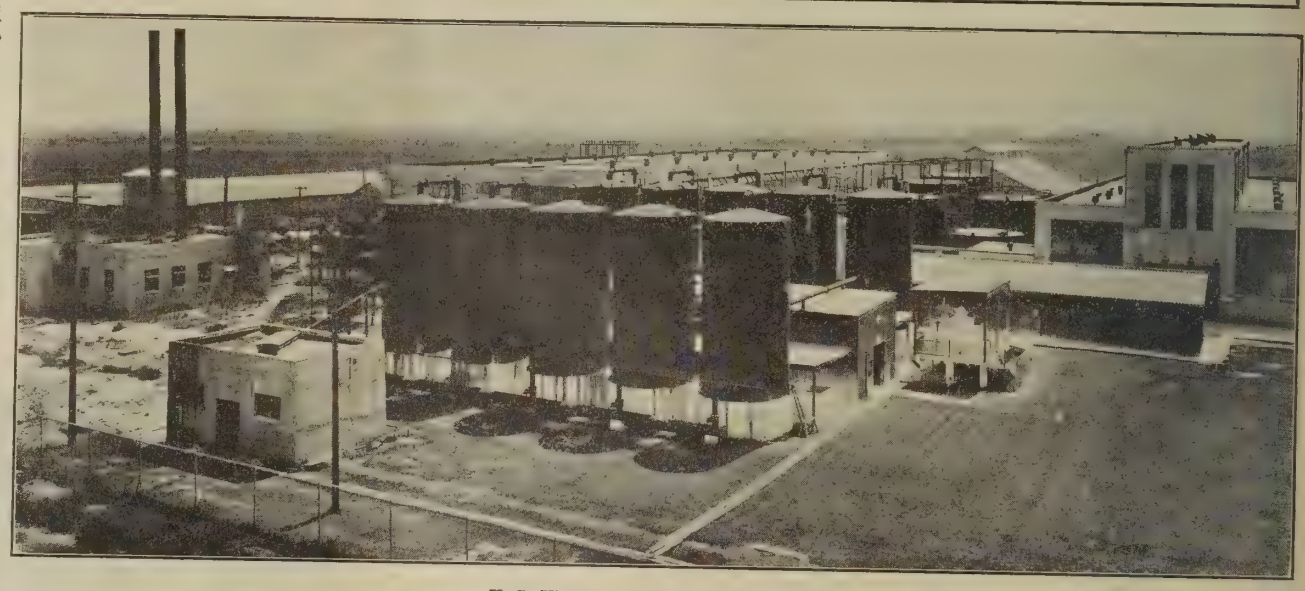
The other day I was getting ads in a neighboring town, and the return train was to arrive in a few minutes. The merchant was at the counter, making some small sales in a leisurely manner. He was going to insert an ad. I knew that. I also knew it would be a high crime to speak to him while the customer, who had the whole day to make his purchase and was in no hurry, talked to the merchant first about one thing and then another. It was a desperate case with me. If I missed the train I'd have 6 miles to walk back, or pay a taxi man several dollars. If I returned without the ad the business manager would have waxed sarcastic, and intimated I'd been loafing on the job.

I walked up and down the store, noting the articles in stock, and wrote a hurry-up outline for an ad on my book. Then I unfolded a specimen sheet of engravings and waited. According to the Main street viewpoint a customer is like a bird—will scare at a whisper. Just as I was about to give it up, fate lent me a hand. The office telephone rang, and the boss was summoned. Of course the customer had to wait for that. When the boss answered the call and stepped back into the store, I was there.

"Here's your ad already written," I said, "and some cuts I've picked out. It won't take a second."

The audacity had its effect. Before he could freeze me out I was declaiming from my note book. Presently he nodded an involuntary approval. When I finished reading he said:

"Go ahead and run it—pick out a good cut."



Another Main street problem is to convince dealers that it pays to give a little study and care to their business announcements; that it means more trade if they write ads that "say something." The ad of a new restaurant man in our town illustrates the idea. This man had against him several well-known and popular cafes. He got into the game his first Saturday by starting his announcement this way:

"Turn About Is Fair Play.

"Your good wife has been preparing for you three square meals every day this week.

SOLVING AD PROBLEMS

"She has well-earned a treat from you. Take her and the kids to the ——— Restaurant Sunday for dinner. Look this menu over, and if it doesn't please the family the cost is on us."

The force of waiters wasn't big enough to handle the patrons at the dinner hour Sunday. Thinking he had the trade started all right, and that it would come with any sort of an announcement the restaurant man ran next Saturday a small ad inviting the public to dinner, in the conventional form. There was not one-fourth the patronage the first copy brought.

A dealer in books and stationery said: "I'd advertise if you could show me somehow that it paid."

"All right," I replied. "Pick out some staple article of which you have a good supply, but doesn't seem to go very fast. And let me write the ad."

The merchant threw a box of pencils on the counter.

"There is a brand of pencils I inherited from the former owner of the store," he said. "I can't figure out why he got so many of that kind. There's no rubber on the end, and everybody who calls for pencils now want a rubber on them."

I looked at the pencil. It was a particular style I had used when a court reporter, and I knew all about it. I wrote out a little "reader" and gave it a good position. It read this way:

"Stenographers Like 'Em, and So Will You.

"We are fortunate in having a large stock of the XYZ lead pencil, which is a great favorite with stenographers and those who have much writing to do. It has no rubber. All the value is put in the lead, which runs regular. You can sharpen both ends. The slightest touch will make a distinct mark, but the lead will not break. Clearness of work and smooth writing are the distinctive qualities of this pencil, which is round, and will not cramp the fingers."

Extensive users of pencils understood why all that description was put in.

The copy was run Monday. The dealer called up Wednesday stating that all but three or four of those pencils had been sold and he was keeping them for his own use. He said the ad made him want to try them, and he had found the statements correct; he had ordered another supply, because he had received several calls he could not fill.

Hitherto the merchants had proceeded on the theory that "pencils were pencils," and that it was no use to make comparisons.

Some dealers think the way to stimulate trade is to put on a cut price sale. That always has its reactions. There's a better way. Create interest in your advertising. One of our stores received a big stock of aluminum ware, scheduled to sell at a dollar apiece. There were many different articles, all new and nice looking. They made a fine display in the show windows. The merchant furnished a lot of small cuts and said:

"Go ahead and sell those goods for me on Saturday," giving the date.

The first ad was four columns, ten inches, with some big headlines, and some large type description; then the cuts and a few words in small boxes. After the announcement appeared, other dealers who had the same sort of ware ran small ads cutting the price. But the people only saw the big ad, and its follow-up the next two days. Saturday they crowded the store and the merchant had a most successful sale.

It demonstrated most significantly that boldness in advertising had its merits.

An automobile with poor transmission or a watch with a faulty hairspring is of little value.

So a community with poor service from its public utilities is badly advertised and is likely to fall out of line with the good towns.

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF ASSOCIATED ADVERTISING CLUBS GREATEST IN HISTORY OF ORGANIZATION

Geo. W. Coleman Re-elected and Baltimore Secures Gathering for Next Year—Total Registration of Delegates and Guests, 2,371 or More Than Were Present at Boston Last Year—Convention Characterized As Great Step Forward in Campaign for Honesty and Cleanliness in Advertising—Splendid Work Accomplished by Various Committees During the Year As Evidenced in Their Reports —Story of the Convention in Full.

DALLAS, Tex., May 23.—George W. Coleman was re-elected president and Fred E. Johnston of Dallas was elected vice-president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of America in the closing sessions of the convention held this afternoon. P. S. Florea, of Indianapolis, was re-elected treasurer. Baltimore was chosen as the next place of meeting, receiving 565 votes against Toronto's 407. San Francisco withdrew from the contest before the balloting began.

The sessions of the last day of the convention were held in the Coliseum, a great building in which horse shows and other exhibitions take place. Although the round of entertainment provided by the Fort Worth Ad Club yesterday had left everyone somewhat weary, the attendance was commendably large and much interest was manifested in the proceedings.

New York Ad League Awarded Printers' Ink Cup

Much of the morning session was devoted to the reception of reports of various committees. The Printers' Ink Cup committee awarded the trophy to the New York Advertising Men's League, the presentation speech being made by I. I. Lorch, of Dallas, who spoke in a most graceful manner. Gerald B. Wadsworth, president of the Eastern Division, accepted the cup for the New York Club. This emblem is awarded annually to the club making the best record for efficiency in educational and other work. It must be held three years in succession before it becomes a club's property. The Des Moines Club has held the cup for two years, but as the New York League has been a close second, the former club decided not to compete this year on the ground that if it should win for the third time it would put an end to further competition for the cup.

Mr. Wadsworth, in his address, paid a graceful tribute to the Des Moines Club. Richard H. Waldo, general manager of Good Housekeeping, who is chairman of general publicity committee, paid a very appreciative compliment to his associates, and said that they were undoubtedly the best men that could be selected. The work of the committee, he said, had been carried on under considerable difficulty, but he said he was glad to say that, through cooperation of a number of magazines and newspapers, that committee had been able to present, free of charge, a considerable amount of information to the public concerning the aims and purposes of the organization.

George French, of Boston, delivered an address on "The Standard of Qualifications of an Advertising Man." He dwelt especially upon the importance of honesty in advertising, and said that if an advertising man worked long enough and hard enough, with truth for a goal, he could not but succeed in the end.

John W. Philip, of Dallas, chairman of the Boston mileage banner committee, announced that that emblem, which had been given each year to the club traveling the longest distance and bringing the largest delegation, had been granted to the San Francisco Ad Club. A new feature of this year's convention was the awarding of the ladies' trophy to the club bringing the largest number of women. This trophy, which is an artistic bronze medallion of a Venus blowing a trumpet, was presented by Herman Phillipson, of Dallas, and was won by the Roswell (N. M.) Ad Club.

E. R. King, the president, in a speech accepting the trophy for his organization, said that the trip to Dallas had been made in automobiles over 600 miles of road. During much of the journey no ranch houses or homes of any kind were to be seen for forty miles at a stretch. While the hot sun blazed upon the party

Visiting Newspaper Men Banqueted by Dallas Press Club—Governor Colquitt Delivered Address of Welcome —State, Municipal and Section Advertising Discussed at Big Meetings in Opera House by Well Known Speakers.

DALLAS, Texas, May 21.—The Dallas Press Club were hosts to the visiting newspaper men attending the Convention Monday evening at the Columbian Club. Among the notables present were Gov. O. B. Colquitt, of Texas; J. A. MacDonald on the Toronto Globe; James Schermerhorn, of the Detroit Times; Robert Frothingham, of New York and United States District Attorney W. H. Atwell, of Dallas.

Three hundred visitors enjoyed the banquet. Music was furnished by members from the Toronto delegation. Governor Colquitt delivered the welcome address to which Dr. MacDonald responded. A spirit of levity and good fellowship prevailed.

The program Monday evening in the Dallas Opera House was a continuation of that held in the afternoon. Lucius E. Wilson, secretary of the Detroit Board of Commerce, was the first speaker, his subject being "Municipal Publicity." He described in a graphic manner the advantages to be gained from a municipal campaign, using for an illustration the recent activities of Memphis and Des

THE VANISHED LARIAT

A few years ago a prominent Chicago educator, about to make a trip to Texas, wrote to a Dallas acquaintance "that if there was a good hotel in Dallas with a room and bath," he wanted to reserve it. When he arrived he found nearly six thousand first-class hotel rooms at his disposal.

On to Texas—but be prepared!

The Dallas News is whole-heartedly for Houston as the next convention city of the A. A. C. of W. There is no city more deserving of the honor; there is no region more interesting to the commercial world today than Texas and the great Southwest.

But don't come to Texas looking for the frontier of civilization. If you want to ride a spotted pony we'll find you one but they are no longer used in general traffic.

The lariat and the tomahawk no longer hurtle over the richest farmlands of the world. Texas—we speak of the state's great farming belt in which both Houston and Dallas lie—is a community of huge resources, thriving businesses and happy homes. It produced more natural wealth (crops and minerals) during 1923 than any other entire state in America.

If you have not kept in touch with Texas' progress the buying-power of her people will be almost unbelievable to you.

On to Texas! On to Houston! And to the many delegates who will as a matter of course include a visit to Dallas in their trip we extend, on behalf of our city, a cordial and sincere welcome.

all the way, the women did not seem to mind either the heat or the blistered faces that resulted from the long ride.

The report on divisional work, prepared by R. Winston Harvey, Lynchburg, Va., was read by Gerald B. Wadsworth, of New York. Mr. Harvey recommended that the present division be continued. He though that much benefit was being derived by the individual organizations through such an arrangement. It was only by getting the clubs together at stated intervals that a broad and enthusiastic policy could be maintained.

The Kellogg Prizes Awarded

The Kellogg prizes, amounting to one thousand dollars offered by the President of the Toasted Corn Flakes Co., for the best advertisements submitted, were then awarded. As an illustration of the value of the contest in bringing out new talent in the advertising field, the speaker referred to the fact that one of the winners have already been placed in a good paying position as an advertisement writer. The first prize of $250.00 was won by H. Putney, of the Leavenworth Ad Club. An additional sum of $100 was given to the Club itself for having the prize winner among its members. The second prize went to William Woodhead, of the Advertising Association of San Francisco. Other prize winners were W. M. Bayless, of Toledo, O., and Carl Reynolds, of Columbus, Ohio.

Attendance Record Broken

The record of Lewin Plunkett, of Dallas, chairman of the Registration Committee, showed that the total registration of delegates was 549, as compared with 405 at the Boston Convention. The members of the clubs, including the voting delegates at the 1912 Convention, was 917, or one more than at the Boston Convention. The number of guests registered in Dallas, was 367, as against 592 at Boston. The number of women registered at Dallas was 538, while at Boston there were only 345. The total registration was 2,371, or 111 more than at the Convention last year. It was not until the afternoon session was in progress that one obtained any accurate idea of the number of delegates attending the Dallas Convention. Everyone of them was in his place when President Coleman called the meeting to order. The galleries on either side of the main floor were filled with the wives and guests of the delegates and with visitors from the city of Dallas.

The interest of the occasion centered in the selection of the Convention for 1913. All the week long the three candidates for the honor, San Francisco, Baltimore and Toronto, had been hard at work presenting their several claims to act as hosts next year.

San Francisco brought to Dallas a splendid delegation. It occupied commodious headquarters at the Waldorf, in front of which was suspended an electric sign reading "San Francisco, 1913." There were a number of ladies in the party who did excellent missionary work in behalf

A Royal Welcome

Dallas in Gala Attire Receives Visiting Ad Men Who Fill Hotels to Overflowing—Enterprise of Texas City Impresses Delegates from Eastern States—Canadians in Kilties Attract Attention.

Dallas, Texas, May 20.—With flags snapping in a 15-knot breeze and a cloudless sky Monday the opening day of the great A. A. C. of A. convention found the hotels in Dallas filled to overflowing with advertising men from all parts of the United States. Delegates had been pouring into the city by special trains for two days. It was a noticeable fact that those from the most distant points arrived first, then came the representatives from the southern and southwestern States and last of all came those from the empire of Texas itself.

Dallas Welcomes Delegates

Dallas was decked out as a bride to receive her bridegrom. The fronts of the buildings along the principal thoroughfares were covered with flags and bunting of many kinds. The flag of the Lone Star and the colors of the Advertising Clubs were especially in evidence.

The marvelous cleanliness of the streets, and the fine public and private buildings, some of them equalling the best cities, much larger than Texas, the snap and go of the human tide that flowed along her business thoroughfares, the alertness of all her merchants, the enterprise of her newspapers were all very enlightening to those of us who came from the northeastern States and had never before crossed the border line of Texas.

Hotel Corridors Crowded

The scenes about corridors of the Oriental Hotel where the association headquarters were located, and where the New York and Baltimore ad clubs were sheltered, the Southland, the Waldorf and other hostelries where the delegates were stopping reminded me of those that usually take place when important political conventions are about to be held, but with this exception—there was no rowdyism, no "tanking-up," no unseemly displays of horse-play. There were lots of enthusiasm turned loose every minute. The war crys or slogans of the clubs were heard in all directions, bands played, men laughed and shouted with the pure joy of living and of being out for a holiday, but none of them seemed for a moment to forget that they were gentlemen and represented a most important commerical business.

"Little Million" of Greeters

The Texans were quick to give all who came a kindly welcome whether they hailed from a little town or a big city. The reception committee members wore

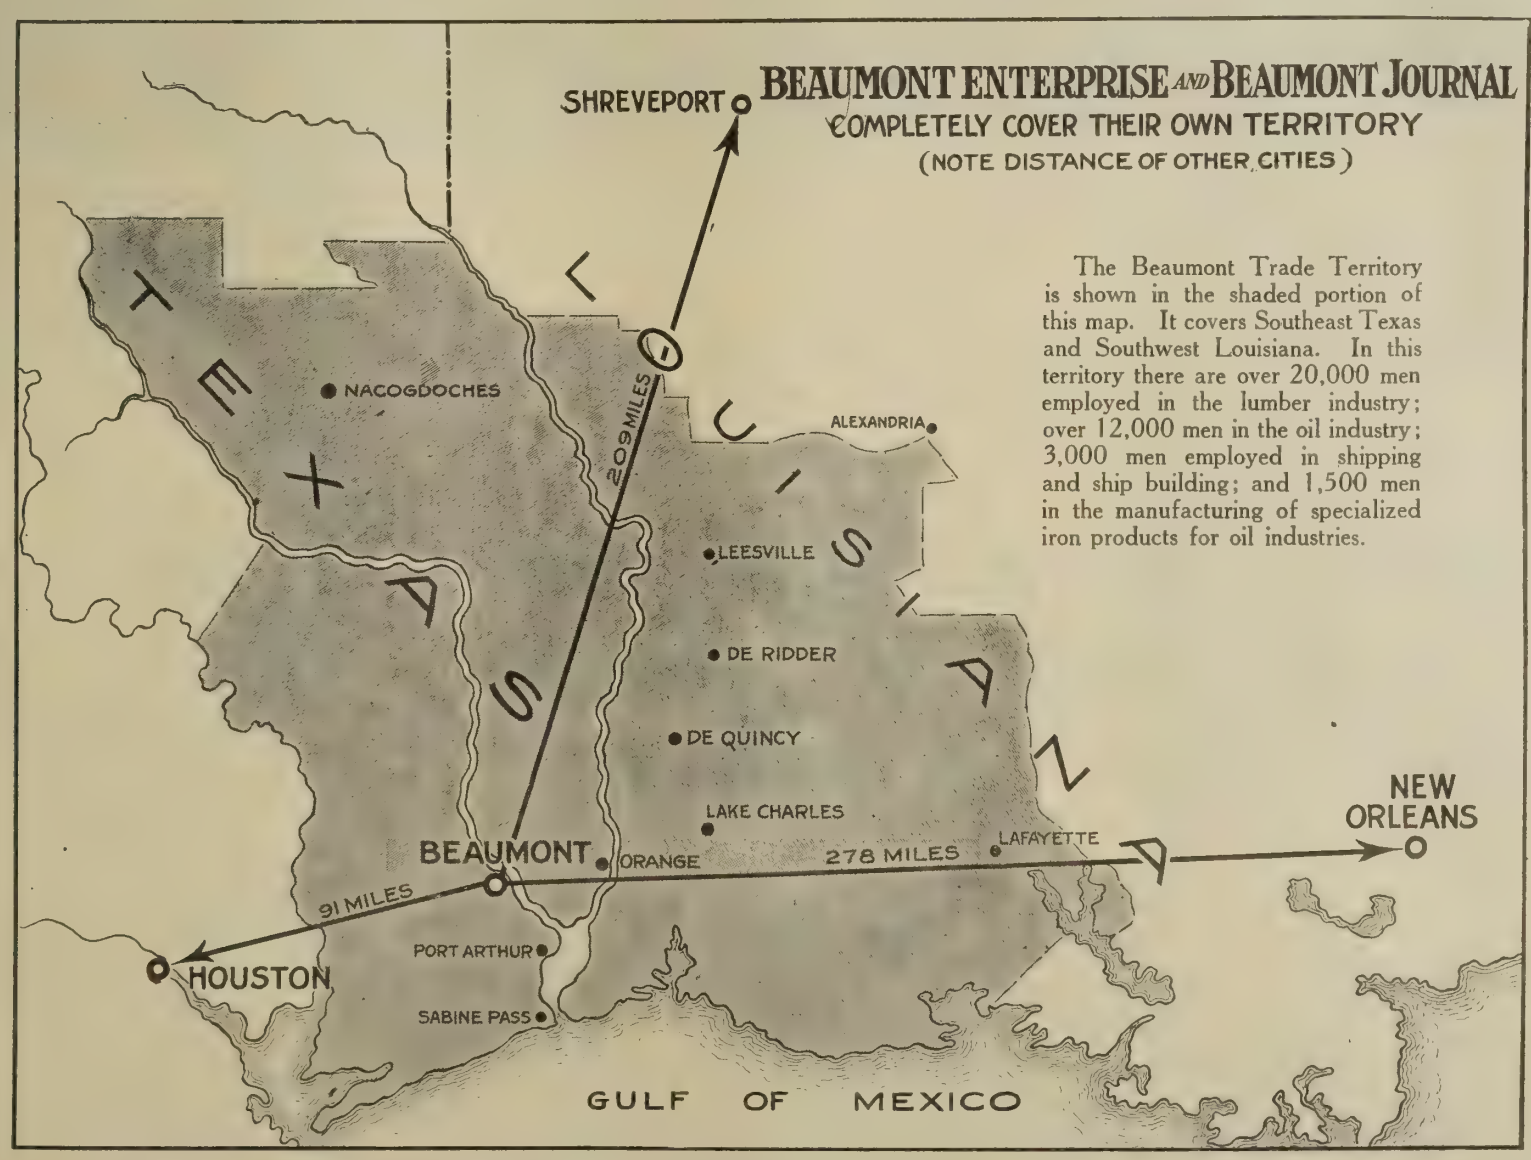
The Fifth Largest Market of Texas
The Beaumont Trade Territory



TEXAS, the largest State in the United States of America, offers a varied market.

There are five large retail and wholesale centers in TEXAS. BEAUMONT is one and ranks in importance to the other four.

BEAUMONT is the center of the largest oil refining area in the United States. The center of the Southwestern lumber market. BEAUMONT'S basic resources are industrial in their character. A twelve month's revenue being derived from the production of oil and oil refining. Lumbering and the manufacturing of lumber products; shipping and ship building. Specialized iron manufacturing.

The most economical method of reaching the fifth market of TEXAS is through both the:—

The City That Built Its Sea Port

Although located fifty miles from deepwater, Houston cut her own harbor to meet the need of commerce. A great market and a great industry have been built in the same indomitable spirit.

Cotton men have been quick to recognize the superior advantages offered by Houston's famous Inland Port, and, during the past season, exported more than one million bales of cotton from this port, placing Houston in position as the second largest cotton export port in the United States.

Since this institution's organization fifty-eight years ago the population of Houston has grown from approximately 6,000 to over 200,000, which remarkable growth has been paralleled by the ever-expanding helpfulness of this bank.

white canvass hats, with "Dallas" conspicuously displayed on the front. There must have been a "Little Million" of these greeters, for they were to be found everywhere, at the railway stations, on the streets, in the hotels and at several places where the meeting were held during the week, ready to help anyone who needed their assistance.

The Opera House, in which the general sessions were held, is a commodious well-appointed theatre of sufficient capacity to accommodate all who attended the several meetings.

The assembling of the delegation at the opening session of the Associated Advertising Clubs of America is always an interesting event. Those attending the Dallas Convention marched to the Opera House from their Hotels, headed by brass bands, if they brought them with them. As they entered its hall they were warmly greeted by others who had preceded them, or by the people of the city who had assembled to listen to the opening address.

The two most striking and perhaps to most people, the most attractive delegations were those from the Baltimore and Toronto Clubs, because of their dress. The Canadians were attired in kilties and brought with them two pipers whose bagpipes were kept going whenever opportunity offered. The Toronto boys seemed to greatly enjoy the attention paid them, not only by the public but by the throngs of admiring ladies who stood along the curb whenever they marched through the streets. The Baltimore delegation wore straw hats that were decorated with orange and black bands and carried orange and black umbrellas. Over the shoulder each man wore a strap to which was attached a short megaphone, which they used in giving their slogan. From the many comments made by both men and women, it was practically agreed that as far as good looks went, President E. J. Shea's bunch of "Convention 1913" boosters were about the nattiest bunch in the list.

Distinguishing Marks of Delegates

Nearly all of the delegations wore some distinguishing marks aside from their home club badges. The Boston Pilgrims wore straw hats with black bands on which "Pilgrims" appeared in gilt letters. The Atlanta crowd had expensive Indian helmet hats of open straw construction. The Californians also wore nobby straw hats. The New Yorkers contented themselves with badges alone. Those which were furnished by the representative club, consisted of a heavy blue silk ribbon from which depended an artistically designed medal inscribed "New York Advertising Men, Dallas, 1912."

Some of the badges consisted of celluloid covered discs as big as saucers. Those worn by the Syracuse, Muskogee and Toronto delegations were of this character. The Toronto badge was attached to a ribbon of plaid that matched the kilties worn by the members. The Californians carried thousands of orange colored artificial poppies which they placed in the buttonholes of all who would wear them.

Presented With Envelope of Souvenirs

When the delegates and visitors registered their names at headquarters each received a paper bag contained among other things a Durham Duplex safety razor, from the National Stockman and Farmer; a pair of President suspenders, a miniature bale of cotton from the Murray Company; a package of Colgate's toilet requisites, a glass paper weight, from the Fort Worth Record and a convention badge of attractive design. The latter consisted of a garnet colored silk ribbon to which was attached the medal of the Dallas Advertising League and miniature reproduction of the National League medal.

On registering at the Fort Worth booth, in the same room, the visitors were given an artistic watch chain, presented by the Star-Telegram; a book containing the program and tickets for Fort Worth day

WORLD-TRADE SIDE OF LONDON CONVENTION

English Goods Being Stressed in American Advertisements While U. S. Products Find Favor in Britain Because Many People Favor Foreign Trademark

By WILLIAM H. RANKIN
President Wm. H. Rankin Company, New York and Chicago

WHILE I am sure that all the American delegates to the International Advertising Convention are looking forward in pleasureable anticipation of British hospitality, the underlying purpose of the visit in the minds of a majority will be to stimulate better business and advertising relations between England and America, and at the same time further to cement the ties of good-will and mutual understanding between the two great English-speaking nations so that a great impetus may be given to commerce, industry and the peace of the world.

Already, even before the International Advertising Convention takes place, much good has been accomplished through the mere fact that 25,000 members of the A. A. C. W. all over America and so large a body of American publishers and advertising men were interested in the proposition of coming to England. I can see that a great change, for instance has come over the spirit of certain kinds of American advertising since the "On-to-London" movement was first brought prominently forward at the Milwaukee Convention of 1922. Go back beyond that time and you will not find, if you search through the advertising columns of American advertisers believing that a reference to English preferences added any particular strength to their selling appeal. But look at it today. On the day I write this I pick up copies of New York newspapers, May 10—the Sun, the Times and the World—and I find a great many leading American merchants making all they can of the British appeal to their customers.

Let me run through these in a single issue, to prove my point. Here is Macy's, one of our big department stores, making a special appeal on golf balls "made in England" in big type. On the same page,

Rogers, Peet & Co. are advertising "Scotch Mist" fabrics, and dwelling with pride on the fact that they are "woven in Scotland." Near by is an advertisement of "Irish Ham and Bacons," the "Irish" part of it allowing the merchant to compete with America's own tremendous meat-packing industries. "Irish Bacon" is a great favorite on Broadway. Here is a tailor who shows "Thousands of English models," and another one who appeals to us Americans with "tailored in the Prince of Wales fashion." On another page of the same paper I find "London Character Shoes" which they tell us "are as definitely English as a Fleet Street Mutton Chop." And they also advertise a Blucher which, they say, "betokens true British breeding." Here is another tailor who says that his "double-breasted Roxbury has the typical English balance"; and here is a picture of an $8 shoe advertised as "imported from Scotland." Weber and Heilbroner offer us hats "after the English fashion," and Cullingsworth tells us in his ads that his clothes are "tailored by hand to our British pattern." My own grocer at Forest Hills features British foods in his windows, notably Crosse & Blackwells fine line of marmalades, jams and condiments. Now that list is only a sample; there are at least a dozen more in the same issue of the paper and without too much emphasis I say that they are a valuable indication of a change in the trend of thought which I believe has been largely brought about by the wide publicity that has been given to the fact that a delegation of 100 British advertisers visited us last year; and that this year a larger delegation (at least 2,500) of American advertisers and publishers is returning the visit. I remember at Milwaukee it was said we could not get 300 delegates to go to London for an advertising Convention. More than 300 will go from New York City alone.

But, after all, this appeal to American customers on the ground of English excellence may be matched, I think, by the appeals of American goods to be found in the British newspapers. A fair evidence of the mutuality of our interests might be found in your London newspaper advertising for there I see United States prunes, United States oranges, United States toothpastes, United States (Royal) typewriters, United States lawn-mowers, Waterman fountain pens, Eveready Flashlights, United States radio sets, United States clocks and watches, United States patent medicines, United States books; Ford, Buick, Nash and Packard automobiles; Goodrich and Goodyear Tires, and a host of the products of our industry offered in friendly competition with your home-made articles.

All of this mutual interchange of trade and barter is to be widely increased by the London advertising convention, when I am sure that the visit of some 2,500 American publishers and advertising men to the vast display of goods made under the British flag is seen at the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley.

In seeking to gain a larger hold on the vast American market—a market of which the backbone is 110,000,000 people, knowing, just now, none of the curses of unemployment, and all working at the highest wages industry has ever been able to earn—it is plain that British merchants and the leaders of British industry must adjust themselves and their products to the conditions of the American protective tariff. That this is not difficult to do is strikingly evidenced on the day I write this when I notice John Wanamaker, New York's greatest department store, advertising a sale of a ship load of British blankets—and this just on the verge of the summer—offering them, not only as pairs of blankets, but advertising that they are such good bargains

ADVERTISING IS A SOUND INVESTMENT

a complete picture of the advertising possibilities for the whole year be visualized in some graphic form. Only this procedure will make it possible to coordinate the various kinds of advertising with the sales effort of the company so as to bring about maximum efficiency.

Having decided to make this investment, the question arises how much shall we put into the investment, and the answer will vary with every individual case. In the answers to the questionnaire which I sent to members of this association, this question was answered by so few that the only conclusion I could reach is that most of us have not committed ourselves to any set program in this respect.

It is highly important that we have a budget, and there should be some definite way of determining the amount to be included. Many methods are used. It may be a certain percentage of the sales billed during the past year. It may be a percentage of the sales expected during the current year. It may be a flat sum appropriated for the purpose. However determined, this appropriation should be known at the beginning of the year, as it is the basis upon which our plans must be based.

The next step is to decide upon the division of our effort. How much, if any, of our budget shall be invested in the popular magazines, in the technical or trade press, in newspapers, in direct mail campaigns, in catalogues and publications, and in miscellaneous forms of publicity.

Returns from our questionnaire indicate that very few of our members make use of the popular magazines. Practically all who replied advertise in the technical and trade press, if they advertise at all. Those who make use of direct-by-mail campaigns are about 50-50, and the same proportion seems to hold for those who issue catalogues and other publications.

It is important to choose the right place to advertise and to advertise right in that place, and the beginner must proceed with caution if he would avoid the pitfalls which threaten him when making this choice.

Each periodical should be analyzed with care. Some of the things to be considered are circulation, class of readers, relation of advertising to reading matter, and whether it is a member of the A. B. C.

To be registered as an A. B. C. publication is worth a great deal to the magazine or newspaper, and most of all to the advertiser. It settles without question the circulation of a publication. A paper that is not a member is more or less questioned. One always suspects that it is claiming more than it has, and it is good practice always to ask why it has not had its figures audited.

Next, you will wish to know the reader's value of that circulation. This determines pretty well the value of any advertising you may run in the publication. Style and make-up must be considered as well as editorial policy.

The percentage of reading pages to the total pages of advertising is another important thing to check. It goes without saying that publications that contain all advertising and no reading matter would not have much value. It would be pretty much a waste paper proposition. The ideal relation between reading pages and advertising pages has never been determined. It is probably about 50-50.

Let us now take up the details of planning a year's advertising.

I would have two general forms for this purpose. The first should cover the details of the other sheets. When all the classes of advertising I have mentioned. I suggest that a sheet be used for each of these publications. We will assume that our budget has been apportioned to the various classes in the proper relation, and that each periodical will be closely analyzed along the lines just mentioned. Here we will enter the magazines selected, the amount of space in each, date of appearance and cost. Having completed this for each classification, we will transfer the totals to our second form, which we will call the "Recapitulation Sheet." This sheet, as you will see, shows the classifications I have just mentioned, with space sufficient to record the details of the other shets. When all the classifications are filled in and totaled, we have our budget for the year, with a complete picture of the investment we have visualized.

Most of this talk has of necessity been general in its nature. I have not touched on the important feature of preparing the copy to be used, nor of the message you have for your readers.

Some of you have done considerable advertising. I would say, however, that you have done very little in proportion to the dynamic force there is in advertising to build up new business. I would say in general our gear manufacturers as a whole could safely experiment by doubling the expenditure for advertising, and by a careful analysis of conditions, invest it very profitably.

The gear industry has made great progress during the past few years. We have faith that it will continue to progress and that its universal recognition as a fundamental industry is not far off. Shall we not express our faith in the future of our great industry by increasing our investment in the one agency which can speedily and effectively bring about the consummation of our hearts' desire?

FIRST PAN-AMERICAN PRESS MEET

connection with the capture of a famous crook: "The gentleman will be deported to the Penal Colony of Punta Arenas."

As a general statement, we may say that about a dozen Latin American newspapers have attained a position inferior to none in the news field. I don't know if the American public realizes that perhaps the most effective step yet taken for the furtherance of the Pan American policy, became a fact when the Associated Press tendered a card of membership to some 40 of the largest newspapers throughout Latin America. By being incorporated into this American fraternity of about 1,500 dailies, the Latin American newspaper is now serving some millions of readers with exactly the same sort of news with which the American public is served each day, and for geographical reasons, those on the Atlantic border of South America are able to inform their patrons of the events of the world some 4 hours earlier than, say, a California newspaper, and one hour ahead of New York.

But, all-embracing as they are, the services of the Associated Press do not satisfy the ambitious program of the great Latin American newspapers anymore than they do the American daily of the first rank. The metropolitan dailies of Rio, Buenos Aires, Mexico City, Santiago de Chile or Havana, also have their own services sent to them from the principal capitals of Europe and America by their special correspondents, and some of these newspapers are in a position to receive daily by cable or wireless not only the news but any comments their foreign contributors may see fit to send on every momentous subject.

It is true that the Latin American paper has not yet come to adopt the healthy habit of its American colleague of printing in its own columns the criticism directed against it by its readers, but it is also true that neither do they go against anybody with the determination many American papers do, nor is there to be found in its readers the lively interest in matters of public concern which the American public shows. Nevertheless, the more progressive Latin American dailies are leaving further behind the old notion that the newspaper is made for the public and are adopting the newer conception of the newspaper made by the public.

HEARTY WELCOME TO SOUTHWEST TEXAS IS SAN ANTONIO'S GREETING

Historic Alamo City, Which Has Learned to Enjoy What Makes Life Good, Would Like to Play Host to A. A. C. W., But Stands by Houston

By FRANK G. HUNTRESS
President and General Manager, San Antonio Express and News.

FRANK G. HUNTRESS

IF THE convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World for 1925 is held in Houston, Texas, the event will be one that every person in attendance cannot but remember as one of the most interesting and enjoyable experiences in the life of that organization. For in many respects Texas has more in the way of attraction to visitors than is possessed by any other State. Its natural scenic beauty is almost incomparable.

With a broad expanse that descends gracefully from mountain to sea, festooned with wild flowers of innumerable hue and unsurpassed fragrance, with ranches often comprising many miles in area, where graze tens of thousands of cattle, sheep and goats, the traveler may view a pastoral picture more attractive and wonderful than any that can be produced by the brush of a painter, and one which, long characteristic of Texas, is now gradually fading before the march of agricultural development, and so it should be seen while there yet is opportunity.

With a lavish hand nature has bestowed her richest blessings upon Texas, including beauty, picturesqueness, unrivaled fertility of soil, climate unsurpassed for healthfulness and comfort, and a semi-tropical environment attractively unique.

And visitors who come here for the first time usually are surprised by the splendid farms, the excellent crops of field and orchard, the progressive cities and thriving towns, the hundreds of miles of highway that affords as smooth and rapid travel as is found on most city streets.

The conditions here mentioned are especially characteristic of Southwest Texas, a large area, of which San Antonio is the metropolis and principal commercial center. And to this section visitors to the convention, if it is held in Texas, are cordially invited, with an assurance that the trip will be one filled with surprises and interest. San Antonio would gladly have the convention meeting held here, but since Houston is a candidate, we cheerfully waive local ambition and join in the invitation of that city in the name of the entire State of Texas.

But San Antonio and Southwest Texas will extend a special invitation to the visitors while they will be in Houston to make a side trip here, for the reason that they cannot afford to miss such a visit. Here they will see the old missions founded long ago, the historic Alamo, where every one of its gallant defenders in one of the most remarkable battles on this continent died rather than surrender, thus gaining for themselves the immortal comment: "Thermopylæ had its messenger of defeat, the Alamo had none."

Here they will see the Mexican quarter of the city, the most important army and aviation center in the United States, a picturesque river that winds gracefully through the city to be crossed at every turn, stately palms rearing above a verdant landscape, more than a quarter of a hundred beautiful parks, including the famed Brackenridge Park, with its scenic drives, its Japanese village, its Alps, and other features of popular distinction. They will find here one of the best municipal golf links in the country, and dozens of other provisions for sport and pleasure not overlooking the numerous drives in and around the city.

San Antonio gladly joins in extending the invitation to the association to come to Houston, Texas, next year, and the members will be doubly welcome here if they will visit San Antonio.

RADIO BULLETINS USED TO ADVERTISE NEWSPAPERS IN SWEDEN

RADIO is being used effectively to advertise newspapers in Sweden, according to Carl Skanberg, editor of the Stockholm Radio magazine, a monthly, and radio and automobile editor of the Stockholm Aftonbladet, an evening newspaper, who returned home this week, after a month's visit in the United States.

CARL SKANBERG

Skanberg told EDITOR & PUBLISHER how radio had been made a profitable newspaper asset, and, as automobile editor, gave interesting sidelights of motor criticism abroad.

"Radio advertising has accomplished a remarkable circulation increase for our newspaper," he said.

"Every evening, just as the Aftonbladet goes on the street, we broadcast a concentrated summary of its news contents. We started this last November, and it has now become an expected daily feature, which has proved a splendid advertisement.

"Radio is very popular in Sweden. Almost every family has a receiving set. Situated as we are in the midst of many different countries, added incentive is given to radio fans.

"Owners of sets can listen-in on programs broadcast from England, France, Denmark and Germany.

"Sweden offers a splendid market for American radio manufacturers. Now there is not more than one American set in all of Sweden. British and German manufacturers are extensive advertisers in Sweden."

Skanberg's special hobby is the automobile. He drove the first automobile ever seen in Sweden back in 1897, and has studied the mechanics and the industry ever since.

"Before writing about a new car, I make a point to give it a test personally. Then, in the review, I point out the flaws as well as the good qualities. This naturally affects our advertising columns. Some automobile manufacturers will not advertise at all in the Aftonbladet. But this is compensated by the gain in reader interest and reader confidence, with resulting increased circulation. It has done a lot of good, too, I think," he added, "because bad cars have been practically excluded from Sweden."

"One fault I find with American automobile editors is that they do nothing but praise the new offerings. They, of course, are looking for advertising as a rule."

While in this country, Skanberg visited many of the larger automobile plants and took the opportunity to study American newspaper methods.

"While we have no Sunday newspapers in Sweden, we are planning to Americanize our Saturday evening editions to correspond with American Sunday papers," Skanberg declared. "We believe use of comic strips and similar features will help increase our circulation, which now totals 190,000."

HOUSTON A MAJOR MARKET OF AMERICA

Started as a Trading Post, the City Has Never Forgotten Its Early Habits—It Is the Largest Inland Cotton Port in the World and Is One of the World's Great Oil-Producing Centers

By HARRY R. DRUMMOND

HOUSTON, third city in population and second in commercial importance in Texas, had 138,276 people in 1920.

Like all cities, everywhere, Houston has experienced a wonderful growth since 1920—but that is such an old story that we will let it go at that.

Houston used reverse English on the seaport idea as against Los Angeles.

Los Angeles, as we know, wanting to be a seaport, and being 22 miles away from the ocean, extended city limits to the sea, making everything Jake.

Houston, on the other hand, being some 50 miles from the Gulf of Mexico, and still having a very aggravated yen to be a seaport, simply dug things up and brought the water to Houston, which, after all, is a pretty good idea.

Houston is a flat surfaced city. That is, there is a uniformity of elevation in and around Houston which makes it mighty easy for a man to be "on the level" there. In fact being on the level is practically obligatory in Houston.

Black gold gushing from the earth-bound sources of Texas wealth. This well is near Three Rivers.

There is, of course, a "Greater Houston." No city, anywhere would be worth speaking of if it were not for a "Greater," you know.

"Greater Houston" includes the municipalities of Magnolia Park, Central Park, Harrisburg, Sunset Heights, West End, and other surrounding towns, corresponding to Yonkers, Mt. Vernon, Jersey City, Hoboken and similar surrounding cities of New York.

Including these surrounding municipalities the population of Houston is estimated at 202,000 and in reality they are all part of Houston's potential buying power.

There is a 30 foot channel from Houston to the Gulf, enabling the big boats to come to Houston to unload and load, and 23 steamship lines run in and out of the port.

There are 17 railroads running into Houston, and collectively they have 157 trains arriving and departing daily.

This makes Houston the largest rail center south of St. Louis.

As a manufacturing city Houston has 383 industries within the corporate limits of the city. These represent an investment of $49,645,000 and purchase raw material to the tune of $56,256,000 annually, making that up into $86,875,000 worth of finished products.

In doing this these manufacturing institutions distribute something like $14,000,000 a year in wages, most of which goes into the coffers of merchants of Houston.

Houston is the largest inland port cotton market in the world. Houston, like every other city, has to be the "largest" in something, and this is it.

You see, Dallas is the largest inland cotton market in the world, and New Orleans is the largest seaport cotton market in the world, and they are both of them larger markets than Houston, so Houston combines the inland and the port, being exclusive in this, making it largest of its kind.

Houston is the largest wool market in the Southwest, and that business is really big.

Houston is a big, big rice center, too, handling 4,500,000 bushels of Chinese wheat annually. So important is this that there is a Rice Building, a Rice Hotel, a Rice Institute and other Rice things in Houston.

The original city was a trading post, and, with its growth, Houston has always remained a trading post of parts.

Some 3,000,000 bales of cotton are handled every year in Houston, and other agricultural products finding a market in Houston, agricultural products such as garden truck and citrus fruits.

The lumber business of Houston amounts to between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000 a year, requiring more than 150,000 cars annually for transportation.

The biggest bet in Houston, however, is the oil industry. Within a radious of 50 miles are some of the greatest oil wells ever brought in on the American continent, having a production of more than 100,000 barrels daily.

There are 238 miles of paved streets and 89 miles of street car tracks in Houston, and 23,380 homes in the city.

Houston is a home city, by the way. The people live in real homes, and take pride in their homes. They are many of them beautiful, and all of them look homey. By the same token Houston is a mighty good furniture market, and the retail furniture dealers seem to be about the most progressive merchants in the city.

Reverting to the railroad proposition for a moment, it might be well to note that there are 54 passenger trains daily, and they handle some 200,000 passengers monthly. The railroad payroll of Houston is something more than $1,000,000 a month.

There are some 33,000 automobiles in Houston, and but one interurban road connecting Houston and Galveston.

The surrounding territory, however, is well provided with surfaced roads and quite a bit of hard pavement. This is being continually increased.

Houston's office buildings are numerous and pretentious, but the retail stores are not what they should be. They are numerous enough, heaven knows, but the business is split up, there being few outstanding establishments, and those that do outstand do so because there are not many really good places.

In this way Houston resembles New York, where the business is so split up that no one dominates.

There are six department stores. Three of these are in the Sidouski string, which includes such stores as Bailey's in Cleveland and Nugent's in St. Louis—nuf said. They are Levy Brothers, the Grand Leader and Harris Hahlo Company.

Foley Brothers is perhaps, the largest store in the city in point of sales. Levy Brothers is second in point of volume, Harris Hahlo Company, is third, and perhaps first in "class," The Grand Leader is fourth in class and fifth in volume while W. C. Munn Company, fourth in volume, is fifth in class, and the Columbia Dry Goods Company is sixth, both in quality and volume, corresponding to Rothenberg's in New York. All together they do some $12,000,000 annually.

All told there are 1,300 retail establishments in Houston and, collectively they do some $72,000,000 annually.

There is a lot of money in Houston, and a wealth of prosperity, too, and, if some big, real honest to goodness leader would jump into the field, and put up and run a real honest to goodness department store on big lines, he could control a big slice of business that now "floats" from place to place.

Such an institution, by the way, would set a standard that would elevate the standard of all other stores in the city.

It is a fact, however, that, although Houston has some wonderful office buildings, and some beautiful homes, if anyone should want to start a store for a pace-maker he would have to have a building built for that store.

Houston as it is, however, has every right to have a prominent place in "The Major Markets of America" and, as Houston is a city with a glorious past, Houston is a city with a splendid present and a brilliant future. It is a good place to cultivate in a business way, Houston is.

Houston people are well dressed. The men are particularly well groomed, and the women look like veritable fashion plates. By and large the city is outstanding in this regard. And they have a metropolitan air of hustle and "do things" that one cannot help but notice.

ALLAS, RECALLING 1912 CONVENTION, SECONDS HOUSTON'S CALL TO CLUBS

arvelous Commercial Growth of the City and State in 13 Years Make It a Subject for Close Study By Advertising Men

By GEORGE B. DEALEY
President and General Manager, Dallas News

Business District of Dallas

DALLAS gladly joins Houston in its invitation to the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World to come to Texas for their 1925 convention.

GEORGE B. DEALEY

Thirteen years will then have passed since the Associated Advertising Clubs held a convention in Texas, Dallas having been the hostess in 1912.

Within that time Texas has climbed to first place among all the States in the value of its agricultural products, the government reports giving it a total value of more than $1,000,000,000 for 1923. Last year its cotton crop alone was worth $650,000,000.

To its agricultural wealth, far exceeding that of other states, there has been added in recent years a stream of flowing gold in the form of crude oil drawn from its subterranean resources. It is conservatively estimated that the present oil production in Texas has a daily average value of $500,000.

The production of petroleum in Texas increased from 20,000,000 barrels a year in 1914 to 125,000,000 barrels in 1923.

Texas leads all states in the production of beef-cattle, sheep, mules and goats. It is fourth in horses, sixth in dairy cattle and seventh in swine. Its livestock production is estimated at $315,000,000.

From its farms, its pastures, and its mines, Texas produces approximately $1,500,000,000 for its residents to spend annually.

Veritably, an inviting field for men who sell merchandise through advertising! A field with which they should become better acquainted. Surely they can afford to come to Texas for that reason if no other.

To come to Texas without coming to Dallas would be like going to England without seeing London. Dallas is the market place for the people of Texas and the Southwest.

Those who attended the convention in Dallas in 1912 would not know the city today. Then its population was 100,000. Today it is approximately 235,000.

"A New Yorker," said Rex Beach, "upon arising in Dallas his first morning must almost rub his eyes to make sure he is not still in sight of Broadway."

In 1922 Dallas ranked 15th among the jobbing centers of the nation, 5th as a jobbing center for dry goods, 24th in postal receipts, 16th in volume of parcel post business and first among all cities in per capita of express business.

Dallas has a trade territory of 2,000,000 people within 100 miles and 10,000,000 people within 24 hours' ride. It has 20 steam and electric railway outlets. It is the largest retail market in the Southwest; 4,000 establishments do business amounting to $280,000,000 annually. The Dallas wholesale market does $700,000,000 business annually.

During 1923 Dallas led the cities of Texas in bank clearings, charges to depositors' accounts, registration of automobiles, income tax payments, building permits, postal receipts, assessed valuation of property and wholesale and retail business.

During each of the last five years Dallas has successively broken all building records for herself and other cities in the Southwest. During that time Dallas building records have totaled $85,000,000. She has 64 buildings ranging from 6 to 29 stories high.

Dallas has more than 4,000 acres in parks and playgrounds; five country clubs and seven golf courses.

Dallas has 45 grade schools, five high schools, Southern Methodist University and Baylor University Colleges of Medicine, surgery and pharmacy.

Dallas has 118.5 miles of paved streets.

Dallas has more than 500 manufacturing establishments which turn out $135,000,000 in manufactured goods annually.

CLEVELAND PRESS ASKS PROHIBITIVE TAX ON BILLBOARD ADVERTISING

THE following editorial is clipped from the Cleveland Press:

A Roll of Honor.

The press salutes the corporations whose names are listed below. They are pioneers of "America, the Beautiful."

These concerns have pledged themselves not to advertise on billboards which detract from the natural scenery:

The Standard Oil Company of California.
The Standard Oil Company of N. Y.
Kelly-Springfield Tire Company.
Pillsbury Flour Mills.
Washburn-Crosby Company.
Champion Spark Plug Company.
B. F. Goodrich Tire Company.
Sun Oil Company.
Hood Rubber Company.
Ajax Rubber Company.
Ward Baking Company.
Dodge Brothers.
Gulf Refining Company.
Fleischmann Yeast Company.

And to the list of corporations we add the name of Flo Ziegfeld of "Follies" fame, who has just announced he will tear down his enormous electric sign at Times Square, New York, and spend the $50,000 that it cost to run and the money that his billboards cost per year, in forms of advertising that do not mar the beauty of the surroundings.

And then we repeat a word of commendation for our own Euclid Avenue Association, which is undertaking to eliminate the landscape defilements from its jurisdiction.

The rapid spread of the billboard threatened to doom the beauty of outdoor America.

Of what avail were the rocks and rills if a billboard barred the view? Of what dignity a templed hill, if a lurid advertisement screamed from its side? What profit it for the woodsman to spare the tree, if the adverstising man came along and tacked signs on it?

There is no landscape, wild or cultivated, that is not ruined by the presence of a billboard.

The corporations listed above have led the way. Doubtless others will quickly follow. But this matter should not be left wholly to voluntary action, for there probably would always be some callous concern which would continue to deface the landscape. The rural billboard should be abolished by federal action—by placing a prohibitive tax on it.

(Wednesday) and other souvenirs. Those of the delegates who happened to be newspaper men, on registering at the press booth were presented with a handsome white badge with a gilt medal attached.

At the close of the morning session Monday, all of the delegates and their wives were taken on an automobile tour of the city and then to its Country Club where an alfresco lunch was served at tables spread on the golf links.

Dallas never saw such an automobile parade, seven hundred and thirty-five machines were required to accommodate the 2,200 people who accepted the hospitality of the Dallas News at lunch and of the citizens who provided the automobiles for the trip.

Sidewalks Thronged With Spectators

The streets in the city were thronged with people, not only of Dallas but from all over the State. The latter had come to town to get a glimpse of the advertising men. The spectators packed the sidewalks, filled the windows of the buildings and some even clung to the cross bars of the telegraph poles.

Owing to a delay in getting the procession started the guests were obliged to sit in a broiling sun for over an hour, and had it not been for the breeze that swept up from the South many would have backed out of the trip.

The tour of the City's streets were highly instructive. The visitors were struck by the number of handsome public and private residence buildings they saw. I have never seen anywhere in my travels such an architecturally beautiful church as the First Presbyterian now in process of construction and nearly completed. It is built on classical lines and looks more like a stately Greek temple of the days of the Pericles, than a modern church.

Some of the residences in the suburban district were as stately and as costly as some of the villas at Newport, that are regarded as examples of artistic architectural beauty.

Luncheon at the Club House

On arriving at the Country Club the official guests were entertained at luncheon on the verandas of the Club House, while the others were at the tables, spread in the field nearby. The later was a stand-up lunch, but it was of choice quality and abundent in quantity. It consisted of fried chicken, saratoga chips, tomato salad, rolls and ice cream. Claret punch and iced tea were the drinks served and then came cigars. The scene in the field was a pretty one, American flags, snapped in the brisk breeze above the tables, men in white flannel suits, wearing the bright colors of their clubs, women clad in dresses of white, with here and there a dash of color, the Canadians in kilties, gave a pleasing variety to the color effect of the crowd.

Monday Morning Session

The Associated Advertising Clubs of America convened in eighth annual session in the Dallas Opera House Monday morning. The large auditorium was crowded to capacity and was resplendent with the different badges and banners designating delegations from every section of North America. There was also present a respresentation from London, England, and one from Honolulu, P. I. The Honolulu Ad Club has only recently joined the Association, and are taking advantage of the first convention which it is their privilege to attend.

Greatest Gathering of Ad Men

The meeting was called to order by President George W. Coleman, who stated in the beginning that this was the greatest gathering of advertising men ever held anywhere on the face of the earth. He paid very high compliments to the Dallas Ad League from the competent manner in which they were handling matters, and in turn thanked the City and its officials for their hearty co-operation and support.

After a brief mention of similar conventions held before in various other sections of the country, he introduced Hon. W. M. Holland, Mayor of Dallas, who stated that as the City already belonged to the Ad men it was useless for him to say anything further along that line, and gave all visiting members to understand that the simple fact of their being members of so great an organization made it an open sesame, and all privileges and enjoyment was surely in order.

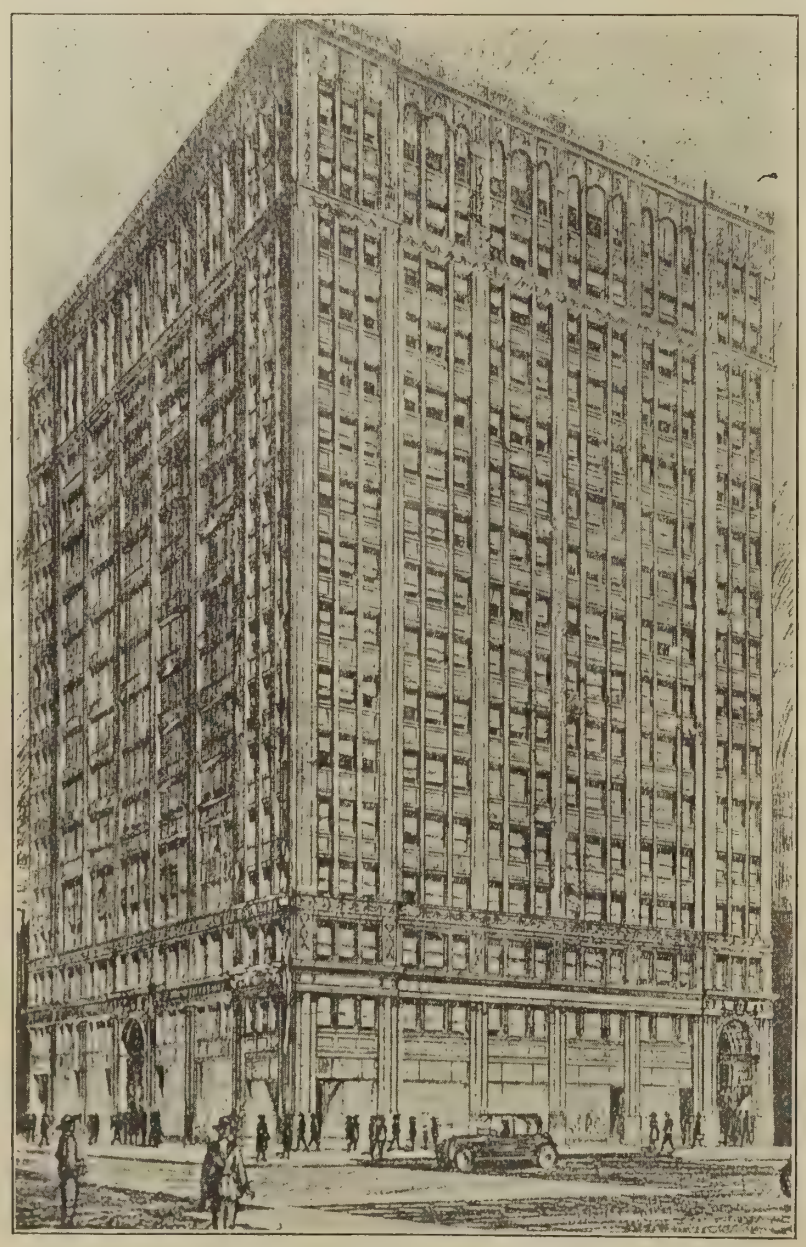
"The fact that this City is as enterprising and as far advanced as it is, is due, in great measure, to you people who have come here from California, Canada and Baltimore," he continued. (These are the three cities competing for the next annual convention.) He also took the opportunity to eulogize the commission form of government, saying to representatives from other portions of the country where this newest form of municipal government is not yet in vogue, that he hoped they would become imbued with the idea and thus sow a seed which in itself, would well repay their trip to this City.

Mayor Holland expressed his intention of making the tour of the State with the special train of Ad men, thus showing his appreciation of the good they do and are yet to accomplish.

Address of Governor Colquitt

O. B. Colquitt, Governor of Texas, was then introduced and caused a great deal of laughter and enjoyment by declaring that "I believe in advertising myself." He attributed the great publicity Texas is now getting to the activities of her several Ad Clubs, and requested all cities competing for the Convention in 1913 to withdraw in favor of Texas, and make this their annual meeting ground. There was plenty of room, he said and suggested that the dates be allowed to run the year round. He closed with a remark that "If the Governor can do anything for you, at any time, just telegraph me, wherever I am, and I will either come to you or see that your wishes are gratified."

Reports of Secretary P. S. Florea and Treasurer G. D. Mekeel were then heard, after which an automobile parade numbering over 500 cars was taken. This was the longest and largest parade of its kind ever seen in this section of the country. Moving pictures of the procession were taken by the Pathe Film Company. After traversing the more prominent streets of the City for two hours, the visitors were taken to the Dallas Golf and Country Club, where an "alfresco luncheon was tendered them," by the Dallas Morning News.



Afternoon Session Monday

The delay in the return of the delegates and guests from the Country Club where the "alfresco lunch" was served by the Dallas Ad League, caused the afternoon meeting, which was scheduled for two o'clock to be postponed until four.

Owing to the non-appearance of one or two of the speakers scheduled to make addresses, the first part of the session was turned over to Herbert S. Houston, chairman of the Educational Committee, who called upon a number of speakers from different parts of the country, to tell what had been done in their respec-

The events of ten years have entirely changed the whole order of things.

In one decade, we have gone ahead one hundred years.

We are at the threshold of a new epoch which is fast developing a new and still more wonderful America.

The mind of America is bent on two things:

(a) Industrial, political and edutional progress, and—

(b) Instinctive movement toward the milder, happier southern clime.

With its unexampled seaport facilities, its irrepressible youth, its mighty will and its unbounded enthusiasm,—

Houston will some day rank among the greatest of world capitals:—

AND DON'T OVERLOOK EL PASO, WHERE SAXON MEETS LATIN FACE TO FACE

By B. C. SIMMONS
Business Manager, El Paso Times

THE El Paso Times tenders a cordial invitation to delegates and visitors to the 1925 convention of the Advertising Clubs of the World at Houston to make the side trip to El Paso. The trip is neither long nor arduous—just across the state in a solid Pullman train on one of the best-built and best-equipped railroads in the United States. Enroute the scenery is magnificent, through fertile valleys and rich farm lands, abloom with cotton and the varied crops of a vast empire, over plains where are raised sleek cattle, past towering mountains and over gorges and rushing rivers spanned by bridges and viaducts that are in themselves monuments of the engineering skill of a nation.

At the journey's end is El Paso, heralded as the climatic capital of the world and the habitat of true western hospitality.

El Paso truly is a wonder city, unique among the important communities of this country. It offers the combination of a thriving, hustling, American city with the dreamy, luxurious atmosphere of old Spain where time means nothing and comfort and ease everything. El Paso truly is the meeting place of the Anglo-Saxon and Latin civilizations in the Western hemisphere. Here strive side by side and live together in peace and amity the descendants of the hardy pioneers who first settled New England, Virginia and the Atlantic seaboard and the descendants of the conquistadores, those gallant warriors who planted the banner of Spain over a domain considerably more extensive than the continent of Europe.

Commercially El Paso is the trade center and supply point of a territory probably larger than that of any city in the United States. Nor is this importance accidental or due entirely to the enterprise of the founders of the border city.

Rather is it due in large measure to the good judgment of the founders who began their city building and planning close to a convenient mountain pass in the rugged Rockies—the only practical route over which east and westbound traffic could pass without hundreds of miles of detour. With this strategic location, El Paso's growth and pre-eminence in its territory was inevitable, hence today the city is the commercial capital of the States of Arizona and New Mexico and the Mexican state of Chihuahua, as well as a section of Texas larger than most of the States of the Union. Cattle barons and the wool growers make El Paso their headquarters; miners and mining companies of a dozen rich districts ship their wealth-bearing ores to El Paso to be treated at the largest custom smelter in the world; from the virgin forests of Chihuahua and New Mexico come a constant stream of the finest pine to be passed on to the markets of the world, and from El Paso's wholesale and jobbing houses of every kind and character are shipped daily the groceries, the clothing, the hardware, the shoes, the machinery and the supplies needed by the inhatitants of its trade territory. Truly it a field to interest advertising men whether on business or pleasure bent. And it is extremely easy of access.

El Paso may be reached over five important American railway lines and over two from Mexico.

A few minutes from the heart of El Paso, six cents by street car, is Juarez, typical Mexican city three centuries in the making. Here may be found things interesting and delicious, quaint and curious, some of them forbidden by American laws, but perfectly proper once the Rio Grande is crossed. Here may be seen the bull fight in all its ancient glory.

EL PASO, TEXAS

Step across the International Bridge that traverses the Rio Grande and you leave the United States for the erstwhile turbulent Mexican State of Chihuahua. Peace now rules in Mexico and prosperity has never even thought of leaving El Paso, as might be guessed from the above photograph. Business, it is evident, prefers parks to man-made canyons as an environment for the daily work.

Here are churches that were holding services on that bleak day in December, 1620, the pilgrims landed at Plymouth Rock. And there are other things worth while.

If you are coming to El Paso bring your summer clothes. The days are warm and bright—you will need neither umbrella nor rain coat. If you find the days too warm, you don't have to worry. Just hop on a train and for a few hours' ride and a few dollars' fare you will find yourself in a land where steam heat and overcoats are comfortable on summer nights. You may even enjoy the novelty of snowballing in July or August—all varieties of climate, from the torrid to the frigid, are on tap. You have but to ascend or descend the side of a mountain —and you may do your ascending or descending in comfort, either by automobile or by train.

As we said in the beginning, you are invited to come to El Paso. Come and be shown.

"REMEMBER THE ALAMO"—CRY WHICH FREED TEXAS

"REMEMBER the Alamo!"

It was this stirring cry from the lips of thousands of Texas plainsmen which rallied every fighting man in that great Southwestern territory to the task of throwing off the yoke of Mexican sovereignty.

For in the struggle by Texas for independence the most sanguinary and heroic conflict of the border warfare took place at the Alamo—a conflict which for years was familiar to Americans as the Thermopylae of Texas.

The story of the battle is a classic of American history.

Fort Alamo was a structure in San Antonio, erected for a mission building in 1744. It was used for religious purposes until 1793, when, on account of the thickness of its walls it was converted into a fort.

The fort was about an acre in extent, oblong, and surrounded by a wall 8 or 10 feet in height and about 3 feet thick.

A body of Texans under the command of Col. William Barrett Davis retired into the fort early in 1836, after dismantling of San Antonio by Sam Houston.

General Santa Anna, at the head of the Mexican army, marching rapidly, entered San Antonio, Feb. 23, and concentrated his attack upon the handful of Americans in the Alamo. They numbered but 140 men; while under the Mexican general were troops numbering 4,000.

After taking possession of the town, the Mexicans erected batteries on both sides of the river, and for 24 hours bombarded the fort. During this attack, which was gigantic for those days, but would pale to insignificance before the barrages laid down in the World War. 200 shells were fired into the structure without injuring a man. The attacking forces made several vigorous assaults upon the Alamo, but were repulsed with considerable losses by the brave defenders.

The commander of the beleagured garrison sent many messengers to San Felipe for assistance, but only a handful of reinforcements succeeded in reaching the fort.

As the siege progressed the provisions ran short, and the defenders of the Alamo, worn down by their labors and broken in health, although not in spirits, were becoming hourly less able to hold their posts.

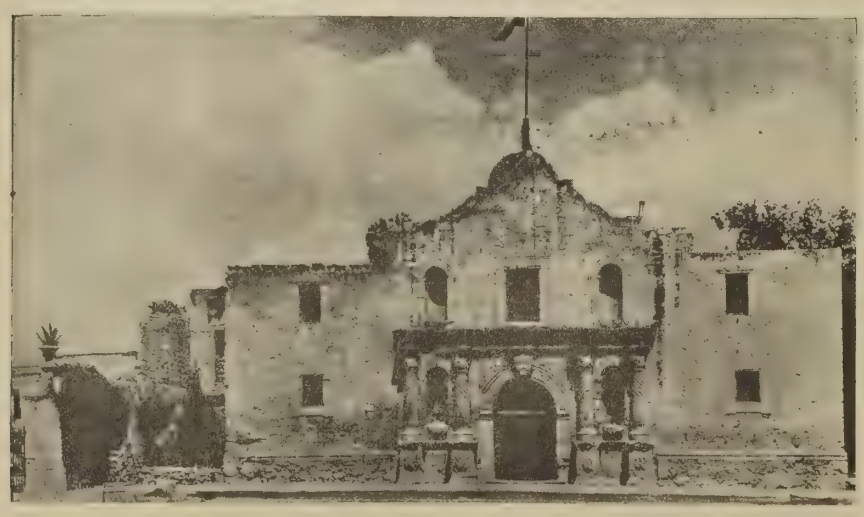
On March 6, a combined attack was made by the entire force of besiegers. Twice they assaulted the posts, and were as often driven back with heavy losses by the Texan troops.

A third time the Mexican ranks surged forward. This time the weakened garrison could not stave them off. Breaking through the gates they entered the Alamo, where a hand to hand struggle took place. So bitter was the struggle, that only six of the heroic band of defenders remained. Among that number was Davy Crockett, who, with the others, under promise of Mexican protection, surrendered.

When taken before Santa Anna, however, this promise was broken, and upon his command they were cut to pieces. Crockett was stabbed with a dozen swords. Other barbarities were committed, such as collecting the bodies of the slain in the center of the Alamo, and, after horribly mutilating the remains, burning them.

Only three persons, a woman, a child and a servant, were spared.

"Remember the Alamo" was the cry taken up all over Texas. The massacre fired the hearts of the plainsmen, and a few weeks later Santa Anna was routed with immense losses, and he himself captured in the battle of San Jacinto.



It is estimated that during the siege of the Alamo the Mexicans' losses in killed and wounded aggregated more than 1,600 men.

For many years Texans needed nothing but the recollection of the massacre at the Alamo to be roused to deeds of valor, and today its heroic defense by that handful of frontiersmen stands as one of the brightest spots in Texas history.

Texas is the proud possessor of many architectural survivals of the Mexican era. One of the most interesting is the San Jose Mission, the ruins of which, with the Spanish-influence lines are still intact, and a photograph of which is reproduced on this page.

GAS SERVICE KEEPS PACE WITH HOUSTON

Two million dollars worth of improvements during the next three years is the plan of the Houston Gas & Fuel Company, to keep pace with the growth of the city. According to the records of the company, the number of customers using gas has more than doubled in the past ten years, and there are now more than 26,000 meters in service about the city.

Nearly three hundred miles of gas mains are required to distribute Houston's daily gas demands. To manufacture this tremendous amount of gas requires over 4,000,000 gallons of gas oil and 25,000 tons of coke per year. This is manufactured in a modern plant with up-to-date units, equipped with automatic control, waste heat boilers, etc.

One, and perhaps two, 1,000,000 cubic foot capacity holders are included in the building program for this year. Large feeder and pumping lines will be extended to these holders, in addition to extensive improvements to be made in the plant itself.

There are few cities in the entire United States that are served with manufactured gas where the rate is as low as the one Houston enjoys, and Houston actually has a lower rate than any city in the South, which uses manufactured gas.

IF IT'S DONE WITH HEAT, YOU CAN DO IT BETTER WITH GAS

tive localities during the past year in educational work.

From the addresses made it appeared that there had been unusual activity among many of the Clubs in bringing to the attention of the merchants and manufacturers the value of advertising in its various forms.

The work accomplished in Des Moines had been particularly gratifying. The Club now has a membership of over 300, a majority of whom are business men, who are seekers after truth in advertising. A systematic course of instruction had been developed through the aid of which much valuable material had been brought to their attention. Great care was exercised by the officers in the selection of speakers and the topics of their addresses.

A shorthand report was taken of the speakers and later the members were given an opportunity to discuss them. Plans have been adopted for any extension of the work during the coming year along several new lines.

Toronto Club Active in Canada

The Toronto Ad Club has taken the lead in Canada in arousing public interest in the subject of advertising. Through its energetic work a number of new clubs have been organized during the past year. These clubs naturally turn to Toronto for advice and for assistance in obtaining competent speakers.

Members of the Club who are specially qualified and have visited these Clubs have delivered helpful addresses. The Club has established a Club magazine called "TAC-Talk"—two thousand copies of which are circulated among the business men not only of Toronto, but of the surrounding territory. The magazine contains helpful articles on advertising and reports the addresses that are delivered before the Club. They have been planting the seeds so well in Canada that a perceptible increase in the interest of business men in advertising has generally resulted.

Two things have been attempted—the betterment of advertising and the cleaning up of advertising, or rather the purification.

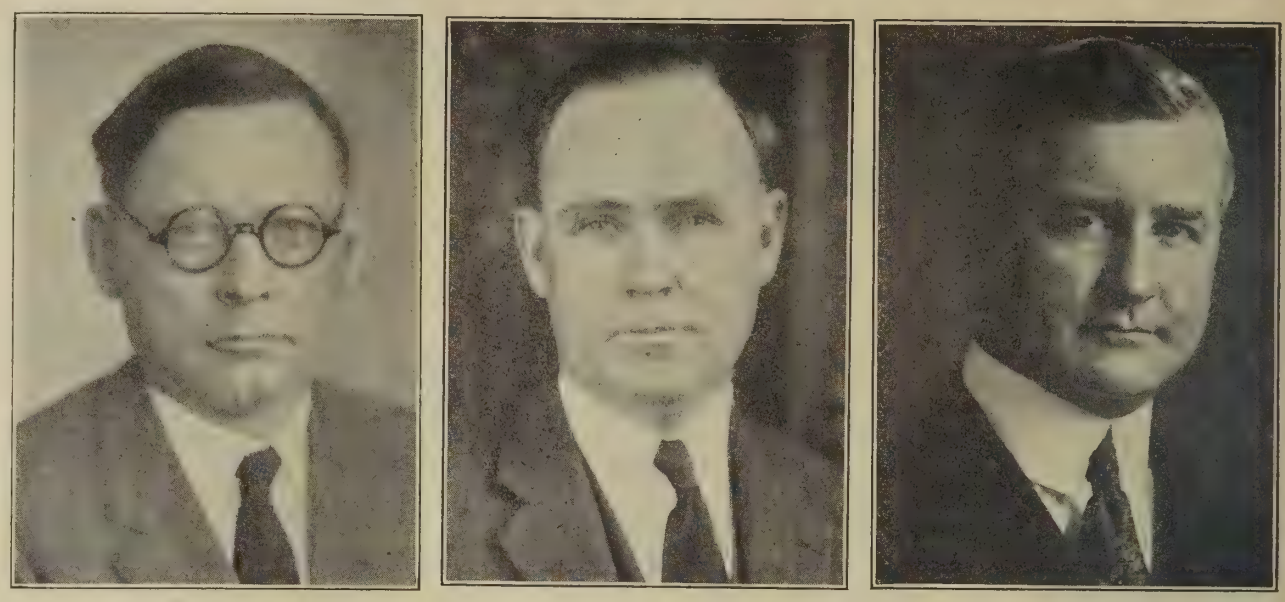
Work on the Pacific Coast

The reports from the Pacific Coast were to the effect that the Clubs of that section had been galvanized into new life through the adoption of intelligent educational plans. The Advertising Association of San Francisco, which was organized in 1906 has done splendid work in this direction. It has cooperated with Chambers of Commerce in various cities and has been instrumental in extending valuable aid to hundreds of merchants and manufacturers who have been groping in the dark in regard to advertising methods and the proper preparation of advertising literature.

One of the schemes that has worked well has been to invite to each session a manufacturer or a merchant to talk on some business phase that would prove of direct value to other merchants who attended.

The speeches, of course, on the subject of advertising were delivered by advertising men, so that if it were not possible for a man to receive distinct benefit from the talk on advertising, he would be able to get valuable aid or suggestion from the business end.

The Club at present is engaged in collecting data in regard to national advertising campaigns that are now being carried on on the Pacific Coast with a view of determining their business efficiency. R. C. Ayres, chairman of the committee who made this report said that it was the conviction of the members of his organization that much of the advertising was wasted because of a lack of knowledge of local conditions and the character of the people to whom the appeal was made.



President Shay, of the Baltimore Advertising Club, made a rattling good speech on the work his own club is doing in the Monumental City.

Southern Merchants Awake

St. Elmo Massengale, of Atlanta, Ga., also spoke. He said that there was a general awakening in the south among merchants as to the possibilities of advertising, owing to the energetic work that had been done by the Advertising Clubs in Richmond, Raleigh, Birmingham, Atlanta and other southern cities. The indications were, though, that during the coming year a distinct advance would be made along all lines of publicity.

The report of the Vigilance Committee was made by H. D. Robbins, of New York. This Committee is composed of twenty-five advertising men of New York, identified with various lines of business, their object being the encouragement of honest advertising and the disapproval and expulsion from the ranks of all illegitimate advertising. Mr. Robbins stated that their meetings were perforce of a star chamber order, as such matters had to be handled with extreme delicacy, and that more comprehensive and effective work can be accomplished behind the scenes. Great stress was laid upon encouragement to be given the honest advertiser, and the work of this committee alone has, in no small way, already accomplished an immense amount of good in this direction.

Come and See!

Houston—in 1925

HOUSTON holds as many surprises as a magician's box of tricks. You'd be inclined to take facts with the proverbial "grain of salt"—if we attempted to tell you about them. Seeing is always believing, though, so we ask you to "Come and see."

COME AND SEE the fastest growing city in the great Southwest; a city truly destined to be a second Chicago and a second Manchester combined.

COME AND SEE the great center of the legitimate Oil industry—liquid gold pouring out of the ground and eleven great refineries converting it into "gas" and "lube" and other products.

COME AND SEE the great Rice and Cotton and Cane fields and their related industries—a novelty and a revelation to those not of the South.

COME AND SEE the only city that ever matched dollars with Uncle Sam and dug a deep-water canal fifty miles inland, capable of accommodating the biggest ocean going vessels.

COME AND SEE the port from which over a million bales of cotton were shipped this season—making it the second largest cotton port in the world.

COME AND SEE the city where seventeen great railroads join the sea—forming a perfect country-wide, world-wide transportation system.

COME AND SEE the other splendid cities of Texas—Galveston, San Antonio, Dallas and Fort Worth—all of which can be seen on a "circle tour" on your way home.

TEXAS WILL BE a revelation to you—with Houston, probably, the greatest surprise of all!

Cast you vote for HOUSTON IN 1925 and these things will be revealed to you of the Golden Gate city. They distributed badges, ostrich plumes and souvenirs of various kinds. The delegation brought along a black bear and paraded with it about the streets.

BALTIMORE WORKED HARD

The Baltimore delegation, headed by E. J. Shay, president of the Baltimore Ad Club, worked hard all week trying to secure pledges for votes on the floor of the Convention for today. The Club's campaign included personal missionary work in the Hotel lobbies, in the Convention Hall and at the several luncheons that were given during the week. The Club brought from Baltimore an excellent band, which furnished music not only for the parades which took place several times a day but also played at the sessions of the Convention at the Opera House. The delegates, who are mostly young men, have become letter perfect in the rendering of appropriate songs, and sang whenever opportunity offered.

The Toronto delegates, clad in their Kilties, and often preceded in marching to and fro from the Convention Hall by two bagpipers, attracted much attention in the streets and in the Hotels. They were not as aggressive in their work as either San Francisco or Baltimore delegates but they never failed to make an impression whenever they presented their claims.

W. A. Lydiatt, president of the Toronto Club, would not allow any of his men to exaggerated the attractions of Canada or make any rash promises as to the entertainment that would be afforded in case Toronto should secure the convention of 1913.

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that at the end of the week's campaign, the interest of the visitors and the delegates were stimulated to a high pitch.

SAN FRANCISCO WITHDREW

When the time had arrived when the determining of next year's convention city came up, everybody was on the qui vive. William Woodhead, of San Francisco, sprang a surprise upon the delegates when he announced that after consulting officers of the Association and after having talked with many of the delegates, San Francisco had concluded to withdraw from the contest on the ground that it might be for the best interest of the organization not to hold the Convention at such a distant point as San Francisco next year. As the Club had spent some $25,000 on its campaign, this act of the San Francisco Club was regarded by the Convention as an especially praiseworthy act.

The claims of Baltimore were presented by President E. J. Shay, and the nomination of Baltimore was seconded by C. F. Hershey. Mr. Shay's arguments for the monumental city have been so frequently presented in these columns that it is hardly necessary to enumerate them here. Mr. Shay promised the association that if they would come to Baltimore they would be given a taste of true Southern hospitality. He had in his possession agreements made and signed by the leading hotel proprietors of the city to the effect that they would not advance rates beyond present schedules. Dr. James A. MacDonald, of Toronto, was received with hearty applause when he came forward to present claims for Toronto. He made an eloquent speech and made a decidedly favorable impression on the delegates. At the conclusion of his remarks the Convention proceeded to vote on the question as to which city would be accorded the honor of entertaining the Advertising Convention next year.

The ballot in the end showed that Baltimore had received 565 votes and Toronto 407. Baltimore's victory was greeted with rounds of applause.

Dr. MacDonald made a motion that the selection of Baltimore would be unanimous, and the same was carried viva voce.

The Canadians took their defeat stoically, but undoubtedly they were greatly disappointed, as they had spent thousands of dollars upon their campaign.

At the close of the convention the delegates walked about the grounds and along the paths for the benefit of the moving-picture photographer. At six o'clock a cattelo barbecue was served in one of the large buildings on the fair grounds. Tomorrow the delegates will start on their trip of a thousand miles around the State of Texas.

MONDAY PROGRAM

Moines. "Even if you get no outside advantages the effect on your own home people, will be well worth the expenditure," said Mr. Wilson. "Live towns are the product of live men, and live men will not, cannot, grow in a community where the atmosphere does not tingle with enterprise." He showed that the movement creates enthusiasm without which nothing great will ever grow and prosper.

"Advertising a State," was the topic discussed by Henry Exall, President of the Texas Industrial Congress. Col. Exall is an ardent supporter of conservation, and explained in glowing terms that this was the most important factor to be reckoned with at the present time. "The fields cry aloud for protection the world over; therefore the most profitable advertising for any State is to call universal attention to the crucial necessity of conserving the soil." The speaker urged that we not forget that agriculture is the basis of our progress and that while advertising this progress and prosperity we have overlooked the fact that these would have been impossible, but for the fertility of the land.

While Grosvenor Daw, manager of the Southern Commercial Congress had for his subject, "Preparing to Advertise a Section," he outlined the work of his organization and combatted the popular delusion of commercial impracticability of the South and in advertising its possibility to the world. He said that the man who advertises, unless he is mentally deranged, must know his goods and, unless he be a knave, believe in them; that the man who reads advertising must have an open mind to be able to accept what he reads. He then went into a vivid description of the possibilities of the South and hoped for a great attention for investment in the Southern States.

During the meeting the New York delegation marched down the aisles of the Opera House, the leader bearing a large banner in which the words "New York Wants Nothing, But Is Willing to Do All She Can For the Good of Advertising." A band furnished lively airs and the delegation applauded loudly. A quartet from the St. Louis Ad Club and Percy Hollinshead, a tenor soloist, of the Toronto Club furnished the musical numbers for the evening.

INVESTIGATORS FINED

Portland B.B.B. Men Convicted of Annoying Bond Dealer

Kenneth W. Hood, who recently resigned as manager of the Better Business Bureau of the Portland (Ore.) Advertising Club to join the National Vigilance Committee, A. A. C. W., was arrested in Portland recently and convicted of annoying J. L. Etheridge, a bond dealer. With Hood was arrested Joseph Loeb, a business consultant. They were fined $100 each.

Hood and Loeb were accused of loitering around the Etheridge home. The bond dealer has had a stormy career in Portland and has been fought by the Better Business Bureau. Hood and Loeb had taken a picture of Etheridge and his secretary as they were leaving the Etheridge home. Etheridge succeeded in winging Loeb with a stick of wood and his secretary dashed back in the house for a revolver, after which they chased the two investigators down the street.

NEWS WOMEN ON PROGRAM

Take Part in Biennial Convention, Federation of Women's Clubs

Many prominent women newspaper writers took part in the press program of the biennial convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which ended its sessions in Los Angeles, Cal., June 14.

Press day was held June 5, with a luncheon at the Biltmore Hotel. Among the speakers were Ida Clyde Clarke, editor of the Woman's News Service; Marjorie Shuler, associate editor of Review of Reviews, and special correspondent for the Christian Science Monitor; and Judith Waller, radio director and publicist of the Chicago Daily News.

Talks on journalism were given daily in the press exhibit room by California writers, including: Zilfa Escourt, San Francisco Chronicle; Ethel Whitmire, San Francisco Examiner; Myra Nye, Los Angeles Times; Hazel Dodd, San Francisco Bulletin; Ruth McClintoch, Los Angeles Express; Jean Louborough, Los Angeles Examiner; Gertrude Price, Los Angeles Record; Charlotte Walker, Los Angeles Herald.

$75,000 RAISED FOR SCHOOL

Move to Re-establish Robert E. Lee Journalism Memorial Gains

Dr. Henry Louis Smith, president of Washington and Lee University, announces $75,000 has been raised towards re-establishment of the Robert E. Lee Memorial School of Journalism as a part of the institution.

General Lee established the first school of journalism in America when he came to Washington College shortly after the close of the Civil War, it is claimed, but 8 years after his death, the poverty of the institution resulted in its discontinuance.

In 1921, the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association assumed management of the campaign to re-establish the school.

BILLBOARD DRIVE DOES NOT SEEK TO ABOLISH OUTDOOR ADVERTISING

Entire Purpose of Campaign Is to "Save the Scenery" and Limit Signs to Commercial Locations—History of Movement Told

By ALBERT S. BARD

Counsel to the National Committee for Restriction of Outdoor Advertising

THE National Committee for Restriction of Outdoor Advertising is an outgrowth of work begun by a number of different organizations, among them the Federation of Women's Clubs, the Municipal Art Society of New York, the Garden Club of America, the Woman's Municipal League of New York, the Society of Landscape Architects, Sorosis and others. Among these special mention should be made of the Woman's Club of Glens Falls, New York. That club came to the conclusion that there was little or no use in further appeals to the outdoor advertising agencies that erect, maintain and rent out billboards, painted bulletins and sky-signs.

As a result the club determined to turn its attention to the national advertisers themselves, and to make a demonstration to them that their advertising is unpopular.

Accordingly, that club began, in 1923, to select certain advertisers and to concentrate protests upon certain advertisers. Through other women's clubs, especially through the Federation of Women's Clubs, it organized these appeals so that appeals began to go to selected national advertisers first by hundreds, and then by thousands.

At this point the advertisers began to sit up and take notice. Some of them even went so far to say that they thoroughly agreed with the women, and they admitted that national advertisers, the country over, were guilty of great abuses in both rural and urban districts, but especially in the former.

Meanwhile, other organizations, comprising both men and women, had signified their wish to co-operate with the women's clubs, and at this point, in the months of November and December, 1923, the "National Committee for Restriction of Outdoor Advertising," composed of both men and women, was formed to take over the special work thus started in the Glens Falls Woman's Club by Mrs. W. L. Lawton.

From the first the policy of Mrs. Lawton and her colleagues was limited both in its scope and method. It was decided that in general it would suffice to ask for a restriction of display advertising to commercial districts. The Committee's slogan became "Save our scenery. Confine signboards to commercial locations." In line with this slogan its policy became one of opposition to display advertising in rural locations. In addition, it opposed advertising in urban locations adjacent to fine public buildings, as, for example, the Public Library at Fifth avenue and 42nd street, New York, and also in locations adjacent to public parks, boulevards and in residential sections.

Certain of the advertising agencies, and even some advertising publications, have persistently misstated this limited purpose of the Committee. They have claimed and still claim that the Committee is seeking to bring about the abolition of outdoor advertising everywhere. But this is gratuitous perversion of the Committee's policy. The motive for such perversion is not far to seek. Yet, quite contrary to such misrepresentation, it is a fact that the Committee seeks the removal of display advertising from improper locations, and does not oppose re-erection in a commercial district where it will not seriously injure scenic or civic beauty.

Similarly, just as the Committee's policy is limited to a rather mild reformation of outdoor advertising policies, so its methods are limited. It did not and does not recommend boycott or blacklisting. The spirit of its campaign is dignified, courteous, kindly. It feels that when national advertisers appreciate the fact that their advertising is offensive to large numbers of people, they will begin to appreciate that they are wasting money on bad advertising, indeed, wasting good money on what is not advertising at all in the sense of making people desire to buy their products. It is perfectly true that increasing numbers of people will avoid the purchase of articles whose producers indulge themselves in offensive advertising. But that is their personal affair so far as this Committee is concerned.

MRS. W. L. LAWTON

The Committee feels that the main thing is to make the advertisers see that their advertising is disliked.

The organizations co-operating with the National Committee include the following:

American Civic Association.
National Highways Association.
Garden Club of America.
General Federation of Women's Clubs.
Adirondack Mountain Club.
American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society.
American Federation of Arts.
National Academy of Design.
National Society of Women Painters and Sculptors.

As to the response from the advertisers: Every one of the companies listed below has expressed its approval of the policy of the National Committee. In some cases such approval has been the result of personal conference with the president or some other officer of the organization. In by far the larger number of cases the expression has come in response to letters.

"Courtesy" from Editor's Angle

SACO, Me.,

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—I read with interest in one of your recent issues, a letter from Jack Prince inquiring whether editorial courtesy had vanished.

I read with amusement Mr. Prince's statement that for the editors to comply with his request and be courteous (from his point of view) would only have "necessitated two minutes, two pennies for postage, and there would be some satisfaction."

To my way of thinking, the lapse of courtesy was on the part of Mr. Prince. He should not ask anyone to do him a favor in the way of writing him a letter on matters that interested him alone, unless he enclosed return postage.

And, his return postage should not consist of a stamp which has been abundantly "lapped" and stuck to his letter, but of a stamped and properly addressed envelope for the desired reply.

I own a very small paper, yet there is not a day but when from one to a dozen requests for information reach me. These range all the way from advertising agencies asking for a list of trade that would take a man a half day to compile, to inquiries as to where a man can get a job. I actually got one the other day from a chap who wanted to know if we had any data on an elephant that was killed 20 miles from here in 1816, which was some time before I was born. There was a special article scheme in the elephant story, of course.

Of these requests not more than one-third of the correspondents are courteous enough to enclose return postage. The result is that those that do not never are answered. Possibly that is what happened to Mr. Prince. I. F. FERRIS, Editor, Saco (Me.) News.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL TO BE SOUTHWEST'S GREATEST EXPOSITION

Financial and Educational Campaign to Be Launched—Will Pick Site After Plans Are Complete—Governing Board of 100 at Work

INITIATED at the 10th district annual convention of the Associated Advertisnig Clubs of the World held at Corsicana, Tex., in November, 1923, the proposed Texas Centennial Celebration has developed in a most unprecedented manner. The preliminary survey, the first Austin meeting in January, 1924, when a temporary organization was effected with Cato Sells of Fort Worth as chairman and Lowry Martin of Corsicana, secretary, the state wide Centennial Celebration conference at Austin in February, when a definite program was adopted looking toward the accomplishment of this great enterprise, were each wonderfully successful gatherings of the most representative citizens of Texas.

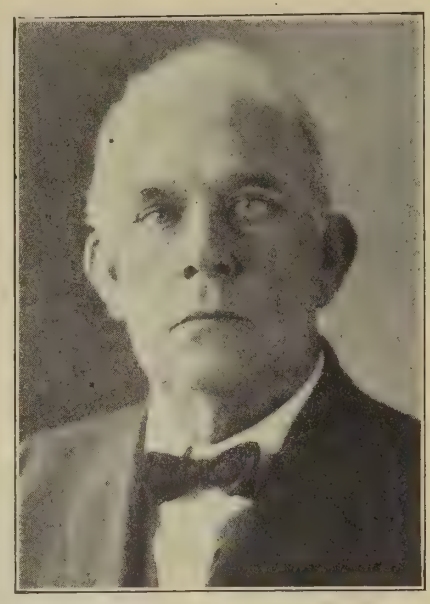
LOWRY MARTIN

The idea of a Texas Centennial celebration originated at a convention of the 10th District, A. A. C. W., in an address by Theodore H. Price, editor of Commerce & Finance, New York.

At the February conference, it was unanimously and enthusiastically determined to proceed to bring about a celebration and exposition greater in magnitude and more attractive in performance than any other exposition in the Southwest. if not in the United States.

Chairman Sells, and Secretary Martin, who have been continually in charge of the activities have devoted themselves unceasingly to the most active and constructive work-out of each progressive step in laying a great foundation in compliance with the resolutions adopted at the Austin February conference. A complete governing board of 100 outstanding citizens of the state has now been chosen in such a democratic way as to insure the fullest confidence of the entire state and make certain such concerted and co-operative action as will arouse Texans as they have never been stirred since the historic and heroic days of the Alamo.

It is consensus of opinion that while many localities greatly desire to be selected for the location of the Centennial Celebration, it would be unwise to determine the place at present and that the time for its holding should not be fixed until the magnitude is determined, but that the immediate and all important present activities should be largely confined to an aggressive and most comprehensive educational campaign so complete and widespread as to bring dependable and actual knowledge of Texas history and its resources to every person in the state and at the same time to execute a financial plan to secure money for expense of operation during the period previous to acquiring congressional and state appropriations sufficiently large to justify the vision of its promoters and create an exposition that will successfully rival the world's greatest similar undertakings—a Centennial Celebration worthy of the great commonwealth of Texas and its 100 years of unparelleled achievements.



The next meeting of the Governing Board will be held on call of Chairman Sells, probably in October, when the two committees, one on permanent organization and the other on finance to be appointed by him, will make their reports.

The membership of the Governing Board of 100 follows: Mrs. Alex Adams, Kingsville; Warren P. Andrews, Dallas; A. A. Allison, Corsicana; Levi Baker, Goliad; W. S. Birdwell, Buda; Eugene H. SELLING PROFITS INSTEAD OF SPACE MAKES ADVERTISERS "STAY SOLD"

Some Dailies Offer Nothing But Free Service, Others White Space Only, Fisk Declares—Should Aim to Make Every Ad Produce

By JAMES W. FISK

Merchandising Counsel, Milwaukee Journal

SERVICE is a much abused term. In many lines it has meant extravagant expenditure that had made great inroads into profits. Years ago in retailing, John Wanamaker originated the plan of giving patrons something more than just merchandise. At its inception, the idea was so unusual that it attracted wide spread attention and incited emulation by stores all over the country. Originally based on the needs of satisfactory merchandising such as free delivery, and adjustment of complaints, it grew through competition to comprise many forms of service such as, rest rooms, travel bureau, postal stations, theatre ticket offices, and so on. In fact, it led retailers into doing many things for which they were not especially well prepared and which in the main were more expensive than their productiveness justified.

The present tendency among modern merchandisers is to reduce non-essential service to a minimum. Features being retained are carried on only because of the standards set by competition. Progressive managers in increasing numbers are reaching the decision that the most profitable form of service is that which enables a customer to secure the greatest degree of satisfaction from the merchandise purchased. In the main, this form of service has to do with intelligent advice as to the uses of the article in question, so that the maximum degree of satisfaction may result.

In the newspaper field I have encountered two types of management. On the one hand we find a newspaper which gives free art work, free cuts, and "Does everything an advertiser asks him to do, and without charge." Naturally, this policy has meant a big increase in the selling expense of this advertising. On the other hand, I have met executives who felt that a newspaper had but two things to sell—circulation and white space—and that all things additional were an extra expense which should be eliminated as soon as conditions made such a change possible. Usually the newspaper of lesser importance offers maximum service in the way in which the term is most often interpreted. This condition may obtain because the paper in question has neither the requisite circulation or prestige to make its space worth the price asked. In any event, probably neither extreme is justified.

The newspaper which gives every kind of service free, often gives nothing but the service and the advertiser forgetting the gift is disgruntled because his advertising does not produce results. No amount of such service can make a poor advertising medium good. The fact that cuts are free does not increase the pulling power of the paper. However, the publication which merely accepts the advertiser's money for a certain amount of space to reach a given number of people, dodges an obligation inferred if not expressed in a belief that the advertising will get desired results. More than half of the readers of the newspaper I am associated with mentioned in a recent survey, advertising as one of the 3 things they read first, yet it seems axiomatic that only a portion of any paper's clientele read all of the advertising. Whatever may be done to assist the retailer in presenting advertising that will secure more readers and greater tangible results is a profitable form of service.

We, of the newspaper fraternity are continually impressing upon national advertisers, the necessity for local advertising in order that they assist their dealers in selling. In spite of this fact, a few newspapers may still feel that their responsibility ends with the sale of space.

Newspaper space alone, represents an expenditure to the advertiser, and the first step in rendering real practical service in connection with its sale is to see that this space is filled with productive copy properly laid out and well illustrated. For this purpose each solicitor handling a classification should be trained in writing advertising. He may have the advantage of knowing the line intimately from a merchandising standpoint, but often lacks the ability to put his ideas into tangible form in advertising copy, or to intelligently advise copy service men. He may not understand type faces, principles of balance, the placing of illustrations, the use of rules or price figures. The mechanics of advertising composition may be a closed book to him, and he may never have heard of putting punch in the headline, or splitting copy into "eyefulls."

The first principle then, is that a newspaper should offer good copy service to be provided by solicitors or a special department as conditions may justify. Ordinarily the assignment of copy men to handling many retail accounts means a considerable expense and only mediocre service because the copy man who writes on a variety of lines has not the intimate knowledge of merchandise nor the incentive of being responsible to either the newspaper or the advertiser for results.

An advertising salesman is often confronted by the questions "Does Advertising Pay?" and is justified in using every possible means to make every advertisement profitable to the man who spends the money. Hooking up the right kind of window display with retail advertising is but one means to the desired end. The consumer stepping into the store should find the advertised goods conveniently arranged and shown in such a way as to again reinforce the message of the newspaper and the windows. It is therefore essential that the salesman learn something of effective interior arrangement from the standpoint of selling merchandise, and also in his visits, after an advertisement has appeared, to note if explanatory cards and price tickets which will help in the selling process, are working to make his advertising produce business.

If the advertiser can be induced to use any other supplemental means which may reflect credit on the newspaper, the salesman is justified in making suggestions. Many retailers use store signs, slips for enclosing in packages, bulletins on delivery wagons, and other secondary media.

No one will disagree that continuity of advertising is essential to maximum success. If the solicitor can intelligently advise the retailer in the formation of advertising campaigns, or commit him to a continuous series of advertisements, he has greater possibilities of making a satisfied customer. For this purpose, a merchandising calendar is sometimes offered to advertisers, enabling them to visualize the needs of sales promotion for six months or one year in advance and to plan systematically and constructively to attain the desired end through advertising. The effect of this method is to assure a definite appropriation for advertising and to commit the advertiser to a plan requiring continuity of advertising appeal.

In fact the service a newspaper should give in selling retail advertising is service which will make such advertising profitable. Free cuts, do not increase the value of space, unless they are an improvement on cuts that the advertiser might obtain himself. Free copy, if of a mediocre type, may make future advertising selling even more difficult. In the main, advertisers are interested ir getting business and will place their advertising in the medium which produces desired results.

Those things which may be done in an advisory capacity to make more money for the advertiser should be comprised in the service offered by a newspaper. But such assistance must be based on a more or less extensive knowledge of the retailers' problems and of means for their solution. In effect, the advertising solicitor is in the employ of the advertiser, even though his salary may be paid by the newspaper. One of our most prominent department stores emphasizes to its employees, the fact that the customer is the boss. A genuine interest in the welfare of his retail accounts expressed in sufficient frequency of calls and the offering of practical suggestions on various phases of the retailers' business is certain to result in greater good will, more insertions, and increased lineage.

Newspapers should sell profits instead of space to the advertiser. Their responsibility extends beyond the signed order for the insertion of copy. If by rendering a helpful service as has been suggested, retailers can be made to want advertising because it pays, the newspaper will be in a much more stable position than if it has gained lineage by favoritism, expensive service, or high pressure salesmanship. Advertisers developed in this way stay sold.

Publisher Convicted of Perjury

Harry Pritchard, bankrupt publisher of the Clinton (Ind.) Daily News, convicted by a jury on a charge of perjury in connection with his insolvency hearing, was sentenced to an indeterminate term of from 2 to 21 years in prison and fined $50 and disfranchised for a period of 2 years by Judge W. C. Wait. Three Clinton men from whom Pritchard borrowed $1,000 and gave a mortgage on his oath that there were no other claims against the paper, were witnesses against him.

Wrecked Arkansas Paper Reissued

The old Stuttgart (Ark.) Free Press, renamed the Leader, which was wrecked by a mob last December, recently made its apeparance as the Arkansas County Leader, with F. L. Anderson, former proprietor of the DeWitt Enterprise, as owner and publisher. R. A. Barry who was editor of the old Free Press will remain with the Leader. The plant was purchased from R. H. and Clay Metsker.

Illinois Editor Indicted

Lon E. Martin, editor and business manager of the Taylorville (Ill.) Courier, is under Federal indictment alleging attempt to defraud the government in filing false affidavit of circulation and mailing papers to unpaid subscribers at second class postage instead of the one-cent postage. Martin's bond was fixed at $5,000, which he furnished. Martin declared the indictment the work of a jealous competitor.

Financial Editor Issues Thrift Book

UNDER-ADVERTISING IS SHEER WASTE — D'ARCY

Former President A. A. C. W. Declares Niggardly Ad Policy Often Fatal to Meritorious Product While There Is Scarcely an Example of an Over-exploited Commodity

By WILLIAM C. D'ARCY
D'Arcy Advertising Company

WITH a full sense of the fiduciary relation he bears to his client, the advertising counsel who is worthy the name exercises a quasi trusteeship over the expenditures of his client. Though he has not the custody of the funds he is none the less in practical control of the size and manner, and entirely in responsibility for the results of the appropriation, if he possesses the entire confidence of his client.

It is a delicate and difficult matter always in good judgment and good conscience to advise or suggest the amount of the advertising appropriation. It would be less so if the advertising counsel or agency were not an interested party, using the phrase with its legal significance of pecuniary interest. A purely academic matter is shorn of interest and involves no responsibility or obligation except that of the integrity of mind and the respect which a man accords to his own mental operations.

It should be likewise with the professional judgments required for the determination of advertising problems—not to mention those larger problems of statesmanship and government which affect all humanity. But the advertising counsel who is genuinely conscientious and as honest with himself as he is with his client is in danger of "leaning backwards.'"

Honesty is a fairly common attribute. Almost as common as it is reliable. The greatest prosecutor of crooks which modern times has produced declared his opinion that 99 men out of one hundred are reliably honest . . . . so that honesty and conscience should not be allowed to occupy an undue or exaggerated proportion among the factors which enter into the consideration. Certainly a man's honesty should not defeat his mind—especially when there is no issue between them. Common everyday one hundred per cent honesty is good enough for the commonplaces of business, while oversensitiveness or squeamishness is a bad asset. Unless we can reasonably assume honesty in a man we want no relations of any sort with him. Advertising agents or counsel are of various kidney like the rest of mankind.

Bringing an absolutely honest mind, or clear conception, to the matter of how much to spend on a given objective, the expert advertising professional knows that there are two kinds of waste—that of over-advertising and that of under-advertising. Of the to, under-advertising is SHEER waste; and it is high time that the better brains of advertising had the courage to proclaim it.

It is hard to put your finger on an instance of over-advertising of a worthy product. We have seen millions thrown away on ill-advised experiments, but who has seen a good thing overdone on a sound basis of merchandising?

But who has not seen niggardly policy let great advertising opportunity go by default—a worthy article potentially successful go down to failure not because it was not advertised, not because the quality of the advertising was to blame, not because there was poverty in the treasury, but because there was a lack of judgment and of courage in the promoters, and the advertising stopped at a critical moment when a little more would have established a great value.

A few years ago one of the potentially greatest newspapers of modern times—possibly the best-edited paper in the United States from a critical standpoint—went into bankruptcy along with several other vast projects of a titan ambition overtaken by misfortune. Many noted publishers and experts in publication values were called to testify in the bankruptcy proceeding before a Federal court, as to the value of the newspaper. It was not quite on a self-supporting basis at the time it ceased publication, but was barely short of the line of bookkeeping which separates a deficit from a dividend. The testimony of the experts was unanimous on the point that had it been allowed to live 6 months longer, at its then rate of growth, its value would have run high into the millions. Its vitality and momentum of good will were enormous, but—its corpse was worth nothing under the hammer . . . . A good man dying today for want of nourishment may have a commercial value of only about $18, the material and chemical constituents of his flesh, blood and bone. But with him may perish qualities of success incalculable—if only they could survive until tomorrow's accounting.

To ferry the stream you must have a cable at least equal to its width.

Varying the metaphor—the short jump which does not quite clear the chasm means death.

To repeat, it is high time there was a higher professional courage to accompany the highest professional conscience of advertising. Perhaps it can be better expressed as the need of a higher and more matter-of-fact common sense. There is abundance of scientific skill or empirical expertness in what has long been accorded the honor of useful, nay vital, service. Advertising no longer goes cringing but holds its head up among the professions, and this, equally because of its high order of special technical skill abundantly demonstrated by conspicuous accomplishments, and because of the sound body of ethics which which has grown up about the practice of the profesion.

It has now only to acquire and demonstrate a pride that disdains and repudiates petty considerations. Let us think as well of ourselves as other men and the laiety in general affirm they think of us. Let us, as a body, reject and condemn the short-sighted haphazard under-advertising that is more worthy of buccaneers than of business men.

Engineers would not attempt to stretch a palpably short wire between two poles, not would they attempt to communicate from one side of the Atlantic to the other by means of a cable that reached half way. To "put advertising across," to use our American slang, let us measure the whole distance to the other side of Success and demand that the full means be available—rather than sink money in the ocean of failure.

Doctors, lawyers, architects, chemists, every other practitioner of high-developed special technique, are valued as greatly for their opinions, judgments and verdicts as for their expert execution of the agreed regimen, program or design. The fact of their possible self-interest is not of weight in their decisions. Nor is this true of advertising counsel or agents of the better class. The reputable and established advertising expert is not prospecting for fool's gold and he has the pride and self-respect besides the professional conscience and courage to turn the gambler away from his doors. Furthermore he has the integrity to tell his client what he must do and what he must spend to save him as well from the sheer waste of advertising too little, as to obtain the highest economy from his client's means and guard against the expenditure of a dollar too much.

HONESTY IN RETAIL STORE ADS GROWS MARVELOUSLY IN PAST 15 YEARS

"Cheap, Cheap" and "Something-For-Nothing" Appeals of New York Merchants Fade Before Higher Standards of Modern Advertising—Typography Improved

By HARRY R. DRUMMOND

SOMETHING—let us not quibble as to what—has wrought a marvelous change in retail newspaper advertising during the past 15 years, particularly in New York City.

Inasmuch as New York City advertising sets the standards followed in practically all other cities in the country, with the exception of Chicago, this improvement has taken place almost everywhere.

Not only has the typography improved immensely, but the appeal, the tone of the advertisements, the selling arguments, in fact everything shows almost equal progress toward honesty.

This is particularly pleasing to men engaged in advertising work as a means of making a living—and having a sense of decency and honor.

It is pleasing to note, too, that with the improvement of standards business has improved materially.

It may be that newspaper publishers have demanded this improvement—it may be that Advertising Clubs, Better Business Bureaus, Fair Play Leagues or individual efforts of advertising men have wrought this change.

It may be that merchants themselves have seen the error of their ways and reformed of their own free will and accord—it may be any of a dozen reasons, or a combination of reasons, but, whatever the reason is, the results are most gratifying.

It might be well to note, in passing, that there has been a decided change in the personnel of the big men in the big positions in many of the big stores, and many of the big men now in control have been recruited from walks of life entirely foreign to retail merchandising.

Perhaps they brought with them standards a few cuts above those of the old line storekeepers who became merchants—in name only.

With the infusion of the new blood, perhaps, the old timers remaining in business have been forced to raise their own standards of advertising.

While having no "salve" to pass along to the new ones, and tempering justice with mercy in referring to many of the old ones, it might be well to mention a few of the almost marvelous changes that have come about in tone and character of advertising in New York—just to prove the point.

Altman's advertising has not changed much. It is about as it was, and it is hoped that it will continue along the same lines for a long time, for, of all the advertising in New York, Altman's was, and still is about the cleanest, as well as the best.

Lord & Taylor's advertising has changed so much that it is hardly recognizable. Comparative prices have been eliminated, absolute lying has been abandoned, regular goods are now advertised, the "bargain" howl is merely a murmur, and is infrequent at that, and, all in all, it is as good in character as could be asked for. Typographically it is so good that many other stores have copied the Lord & Taylor style until it is no longer distinctive—but, inasmuch as Lord & Taylor swiped the style from Marshall Field & Co. of Chicago, there is no come back.

It may be, and probably is that Mr. Samuel Reyburn, who has been the head of the house for the past decade, and who is, or was, a banker, is responsible for the change which the old timers could not see.

It might be well to note that the old timers who could not see the handwriting on the wall were so "successful" that the bankers had to take the business over, and that the bankers have made it a success.

Macy's is another store that has changed around in advertising and much to its advantage.

Fifteen years ago Macy's chief and ONLY appeal was "CHEAP, CHEAP." Macy's at that time vied with Siegel Cooper & Co., in furnishing jokes for vaudeville artists. No more. The same old management is there, but Macy's advertising has taken on a cloak of respectability, of standards, and improved typographical appearance that is most pleasing—and the appeal is to a much higher class of trade.

Does it pay? Well, Macy's have just completed an addition to their store—an addition that is really an addition—and it was not paid for out of LOSSES.

Saks & Co. have changed their advertising materially, and for the better. It reflects a different kind of merchandising and a different kind of merchandise. It was good 15 years ago—it is much better now—and Saks & Co. are moving up on Fifth avenue, which is proof that such advertising pays.

McCreery's advertising is entirely different. The big change there is in its typography. There is another store where the old guard had to step down and out to make room for modern methods and bigger men—men recruited from outside of department stores.

One of the striking changes is the advertising of Brill Brothers.

Fifteen years ago Brill Brothers advertising was "whoop te doo" appeal to the bargain hunter, the come-on man, the something-for-nothing guy. It was crude, raw and rotten, and it built up a business that had to be "pulled in" for every purchase.

It has been improving for some time, and now it stands out as real decent, real believable.

Brill Brothers advertising has a terrible past to live down, but there is no alternative, for there is no use in returning to the old way—it is obsolete and would not pay any more.

Wanamaker's advertising was the talk of the country 15 years ago. It has changed less, perhaps, than the advertising of any other store in the city during that time, and today it is a throw back to the old days.

Fifteen years ago it set the pace—today it is just as good as it was then—but the standards have been raised so high since then that it hardly measures up to several other advertising campaigns now running.

Another store that has changed its advertising throughout is Hearn's. The change there is almost wholly typographical, and much for the better.

Many of the old timers have gone the way of all things. Most of the dear departed in departing have greatly benefited merchandising standards, and their passing has been a blessing.

We can harken back to The 14th Street Store, Seigel-Cooper's, Simpson-Crawford Company, O'Neil's, Adams, Le-Boutellier Brothers, and several others that, in "the good old days" thrived and waxed fat, but, eventually were found out by EVERYBODY, and had to stop.

Perhaps, when the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World convene in London something may be said about retail advertising. Perhaps it may be noted that there is a vast improvement. Perhaps it may be conceded, at least in the convention, that the improvement has been due to the good work of Vigilance Committees, or something fathered by advertising clubs, and the work may be given a boost and the workers a pat on the back—for they deserve it.

In Interview Hearst Speaks Plainly of Policies of His Organization

Has No Plan for Given Number of Papers—Buys When Others Want to Sell, If He Sees Success Ahead—"No Menacing Monopoly"—Public Benefits From Progressive Newspapers—World's Greatest Newspaper Proprietor Freely Discusses Many Vital Questions in Journalism

Copyright, 1924, by EDITOR & PUBLISHER

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST, in an extraordinary interview exclusively granted to EDITOR AND PUBLISHER this week, clearly revealed his opinion and policy on vital questions in journalism.

Following his custom in recent years Mr. Hearst chose to prepare textual replies to a series of formal questions. EDITOR AND PUBLISHER prepared 15 questions, specifying that Mr. Hearst might feel free to disregard any one of them. He answered them all, dictating his replies to his secretary.

"Is it true that your intention is to possess one hundred newspapers in the United States?" was the first question asked.

Mr. Hearst said: "I have no intention to possess any given number of newspapers nor any plan to possess any more newspapers or to take on any more work or trouble.

"But occasionally somebody wants to get rid of a paper and tries to sell it to me, and if I think I can see a way to make it a success, I am very likely to take over the job and try out my program."

(2) "Granted that you believe in your own editorial policies, still as a citizen do you believe that it is good public policy for one mortal man to possess the great power that is inherent in the control of so many newspapers?"

Mr. Hearst said: "In the first place, I have not 'so many newspapers.' There are twenty-five hundred newspapers in the United States, and I have twenty-three newspapers. No very menacing monopoly in that proportion, I should say.

"In the second place there are ten times as many newspapers as I possess, owned by reactionary and predatory interests that endeavor to use them in their schemes to exploit the public.

"And, therefore, it is not only not dangerous but exceedingly beneficial from a public viewpoint to have a few groups of newspapers like the Scripps-Howard papers and mine, owned and operated in support of progressive policies, and to protect the public's property and privileges.

"In the third place, no newspaper has power for long if it misuse it—which is the saving situation in the possession of newspapers by public exploiters; and perhaps, too, with respect to any individuals or interests.

"We all know many cases where policies and nominees have failed of public approval although every newspaper in the community supported them, or have secured public approval although every newspaper opposed them.

"The American people are an independently thinking people.

"Newspapers do not form the opinion of the public; but if they are to be successful, they must express the opinion of the public."

---

(3) "How is it possible for you or any man to delegate authority which will guarantee an administration of a newspaper in a distant city which will be fair and just to readers in local matters, concerning which you could not possibly have full information?"

"The assumption that I cannot find able men in a community to conduct a newspaper as well as I would if I were on the ground is a piece of stupid conceit of which I am not guilty.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST

"I organize our papers with the best men available in a community and they consult me in general matters, but endeavor to carry out the desires of the community in all community matters.

"In addition I generally have a local advisory board of leading citizens to help the local publisher to obtain accurate information in regard to local requirements and sentiments.

"The whole purpose of our papers is to serve loyally the communities in which they are respectively published; and the papers are united into one large organization only to make that service more effective."

(4) "When you buy a newspaper, what do you pay for? Mr. Munsey says he does not pay for circulation, but character."

"I pay for opportunity. The character and circulation of a paper are what you make them. The opportunity is determined by the field and the relative excellence of the competing newspapers."

(5) What must a newspaper yield, from its business and from its editorial departments, to meet your minimum requirements?

"I have no minimum or maximum requirements. I expect a newspaper to make as much profit as is compatible with giving the public a good newspaper, and making subscribers and advertisers feel that they are getting a full return for their money in excellence and service.

"I spend a lot of money in making my newspapers. As a matter of fact I put back into the making of my newspapers over ninety percent of the money these newspapers take in from subscribers and advertisers. This I think I ought to do in order to give adequate service."

(6) "What is the capital value of a regular subscriber?"

"I do not know. I do not think you can estimate the value of a satisfied subscriber merely in terms of money."

---

(7) "How do you define the power of a newspaper which reaches from twenty-five to fifty percent of the population of a first-class American city, and to what extent have newspaper editors and advertisers exercised this power?"

"The power of a newspaper depends not merely upon the number of its readers, but upon the confidence its readers repose in it. That confidence is earned by intelligent and unselfish service—by a long record of effort for the public good as the editor sees it.

"The power of a newspaper which has deserved and won the confidence of its readers is considerable; but the American people do not follow blindly the lead of any newspaper, even though they may entirely respect its motives."

(8) "Is the political influence of the American press, in general, declining or increasing and why?"

"I rather think that the influence of the American press is on the whole declining. This, I believe, is because so many newspapers are owned or influenced by reactionary interests and predatory corporations, and are used selfishly, to promote the welfare of these reactionary interests, rather than the welfare of the public.

"This tends to weaken the confidence of the public in all newspapers more or less.

"Furthermore there are other agencies of publicity which divide the field with the newspapers nowadays. There are the moving pictures and the radio for example."

---

(9) "Are you interested in radio and what does it promise?"

"I am very much interested in radio, but I do not know how much it promises for independent enterprise.

"It looks at present as if radio were likely to be controlled by a few large corporations and employed in great part for their propaganda.

"However, there may develop a great field for radio in connection with newspapers and news services."

---

(10) "Do you care to discuss the sale of stocks of newspaper corporations in the open market—and why do you sell bonds?"

"I sold bonds because I wanted to borrow some money, and I preferred to borrow it from the public rather than from Wall Street."

(11) "Is circulation the test of merit?"

"To a degree circulation is a test of merit. If any manufactured article sold more and at a higher price than another similar article, you would naturally infer that the one which sold the greater amount at the higher price was the better—or at least that it pleased the public better; and that is the main standard of comparison."

---

(12) "When are advertising rates too low?"

"Advertising rates are too low when they give the advertiser a great profit and the newspaper little or no profit, as is often the case.

"Advertising rates are seldom too high, if an advertiser knows how to employ advantageously the publicity of a widely distributed and well established newspaper."

(13) "Why do you give so much time to motion pictures?"

"I give so much time to motion pictures because I think they are as important as publications as agencies of publicity, both for information and entertainment."

---

(14) "Will we have five-cent newspapers in America, and why?"

"I do not think there will be many five-cent papers unless the price of print paper materially increases."

---

(15) "What are the correct proportions of the daily ration in percentages—news, advertising, opinion, entertainment?"

"The correct proportions of news, advertising, opinion and entertainment are what every fellow has to figure out for himself with relation to the conditions which confront him.

"However, there is one thing sure, and that is that the news and the opinions, and to a certain extent the advertising, must all come under the head of entertainment to a reasonable degree or they will not be read.

"People do not read to be bored. They read to be interested, and unless we can make our material in every department interesting, it simply is not read; in which case we would be like the chap who winked at the girl in the dark—we would know what we are doing but the public would not."

—their manufacture having been supervised by the British government—that he offers them in bales at $87.50 for a bale containing 25 blankets, and the entire lot was sold because of their great advertising in daily newspapers in spite of the tariff.

There has always been, for instance, a Canadian tariff against American goods, with a view of having our United States manufacturers make provisions that our advertised products be made in Canada by Canadian labor, and even in the face of such conditions hundreds of United States manufacturers have been able to establish factories across the line and make and sell at a profit; and many other American industries have built up Canadian branches, paid the high duty, and have competed with Canadian made goods. As usual, however, the Canadian consumer pays increased prices because of such tariffs. The Canadian tariff is no different than the United States tariff on British goods; and British advertisers that are handicapped because of our tariff must plan to make their goods in the United States just as we do in Canada and just as Lever Brothers have done in this country. They are one of our most successful advertisers.

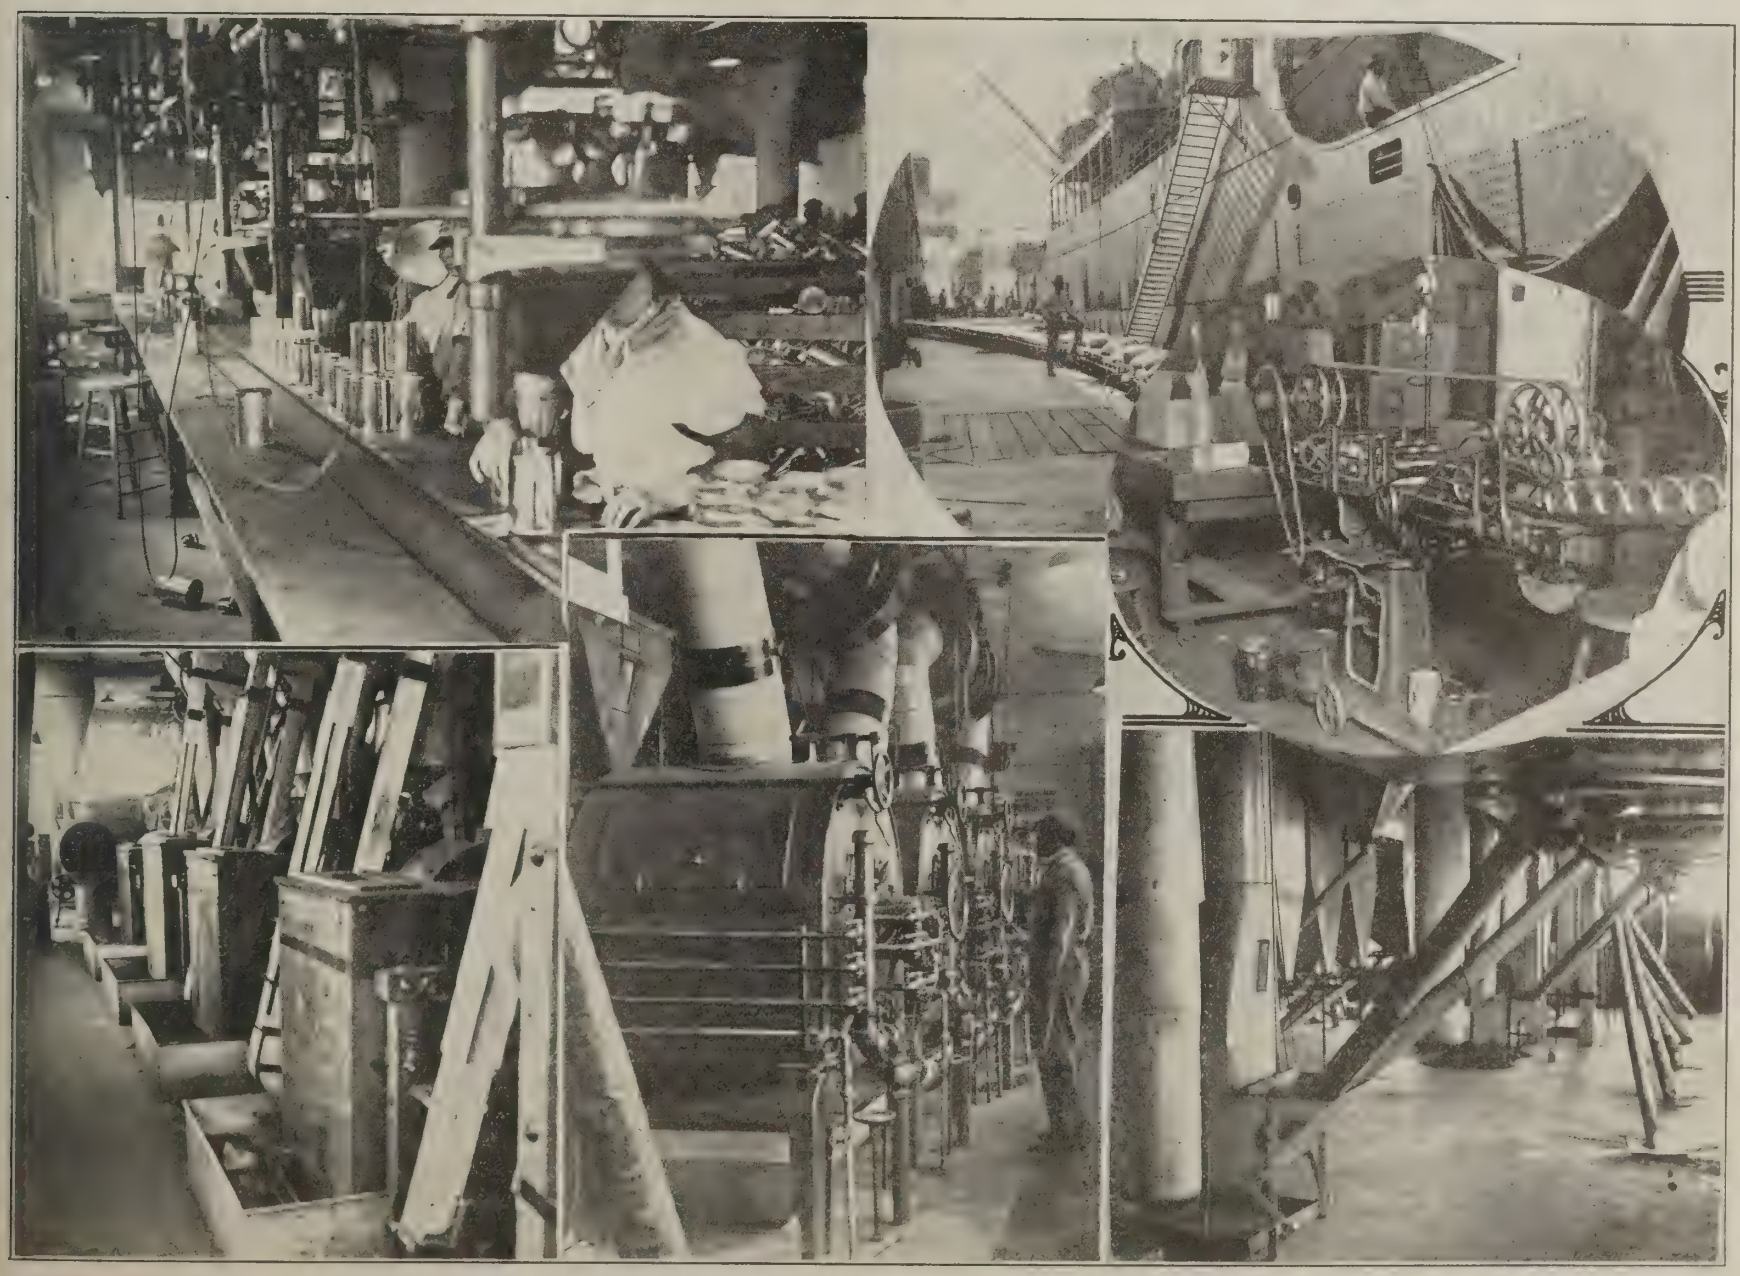
And speaking about Ford cars I see that there is some discussion about breaking down the British tariff barriers against American products which, if done, would let the Ford and other low priced cars into England, where I hope that it would do as much for the spread of true Democracy as it has done with us.

I don't want to make too much of a point of this, but an interesting brochure might be written on the social, industrial and even political influence of the Ford car in the United States. This vehicle, cheap enough and efficient enough so that even the day laborer may own and ride in one, has worked wonders for the uplift of the true Democratic spirit. It has enabled great masses of people to rent or own homes in the suburbs, instead of crowding into apartments or flats in town. The owning of an automobile—any sort of an automobile—has naturally increased the owner's self-respect; given him a broader outlook on life; caused him to demand and live upon a higher standard. Because Ford makes more than 3,000,000 Fords a year he sells a car that, if made by the thousands would cost more than $1,000, for $295, and this year he is spending more than $10,000,000 in advertising.

If then, by a lowering of the British tariff wall the Ford car invades Great Britain in vaster quantities, and at a better price than it has up to now, it is going to be curious to note what changes it brings about in the character of the English people. One of my guesses is that it will make for conservatism; that it will break down class lines which are already, I understand, crumbling a bit under a labor Government, and that it will increase the British standard of living just as it has done on this side of the water.

That there will be an increase in world-business, in world barter and trade and in world industry and advertising and sales, because of the impetus started by the International Convention of Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in London, I am absolutely confident. I do not think that all the advantages that result are to accrue to the United States; nor do I believe that the British Empire is to reap the largest part of the benefit. It seems to me that beginning right from the time of the Convention in July we Americans and Britishers will see that it is to our mutual interest to travel side by side in the friendly race for the world's trade, even in a better way than it has been possible for us to do in world affairs, and in doing so the business and advertising men of our two countries can help our statesmen to understand and co-operate better because of our friendly business and advertising interests. We shall compete with each other, it is true; just as we have done in the past, but it will be a competition in excellence, in honesty and in fair dealing from which the entire world will benefit.

Above all else, we will buy and sell to each other. You sell to us what you make best, and we will sell you where we have the advantage, and the London Convention will help this trade for our mutual good.



Whenever the British housewife buys a good American product the whole family has a more friendly feeling towards U. S. A. and likewise, when an American family buys British goods like Crosse & Blackwells, the whole family feels friendlier to Great Britain. And likewise, the advertisements during the past three years on your side and ours have been friendly messages of good-will and invitations to be more friendly.

I sincerely believe Great Britain has received at least a £1,000,000 of good-will advertising and news publicity because of the London 1924 Advertising Convention, and the sponsors and workers for that great project deserve honor and real recognition by the British Government.

The way Great Britain and the British Empire Exhibition can cash in on the good to be derived from such an Exhibition is to show it in this country—New York, Chicago, San Francisco, and in Toronto, Canada, after it has run its course in Great Britain.

There are men and organizations in this country who are ready and willing to handle an exhibition of this kind in a most satisfactory and successful way, and all it needs now is the sanction of the British Government to send those parts of the Exhibition to America in which Americans will be most interested.

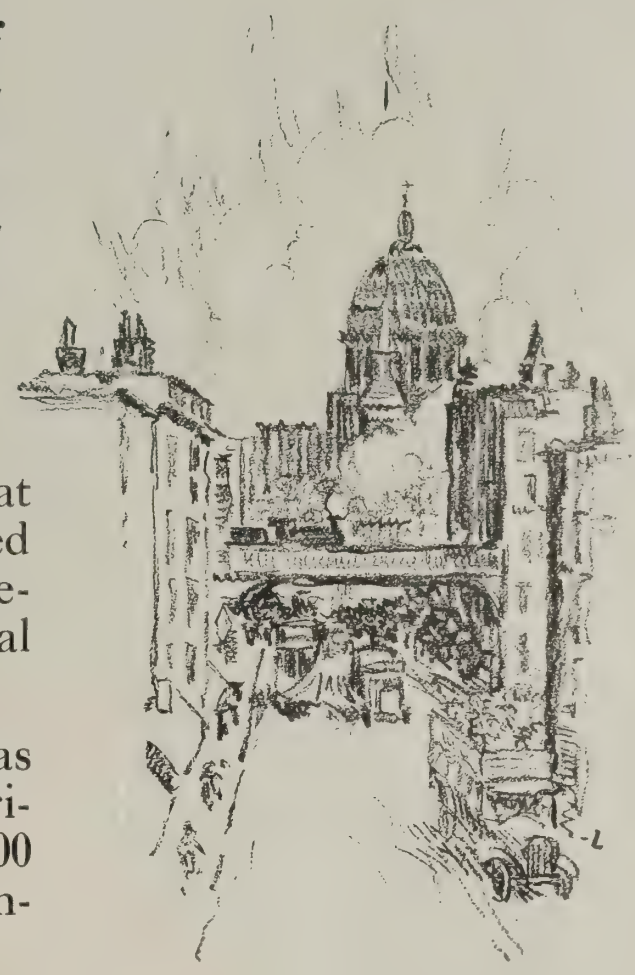
While in Europe read The Chicago Tribune every day



SEVEN days every week The Chicago Tribune publishes a European edition in Paris. It contains not only the news of Europe but also a cable report from The United States and Tribune cartoons and features.

In every important city of Europe, Northern Africa and Western Asia, and in hundreds of smaller centers visited by tourists, The European Edition of The Chicago Tribune is on sale. Your hotel porter or concierge can always secure The Tribune for you each morning or you can buy it at railway newsstands, kiosks, etc.

The European Edition is successor to The Army Edition which made its appearance July 4th, 1917, greeting the first American troop to march through France. The Army Edition was founded to sustain the morale of the A. E. F. The Chicago Tribune pledged all profits to army charities. WASHINGTON

Is The Focal City of America

The eyes of the country are constantly centered on Washington. It's everybody's city—in whose beauty they take pride; in whose welfare they feel a personal interest, and within whose precincts they feel at home. Not only is it the Capital City, but the Convention City of America. Every organization of men and women looks forward to holding its national and international meetings in Washington. No city can offer the same interesting incentive; nor exercise the same patriotic impulse—nor reward with equal satisfaction as does Washington.

That which makes it the national Mecca also makes it the ideal point from which to launch a national advertising campaign.

You literally contact every section of the country—appeal to every phase of national life—in Washington.

It is one of the few cities in the United States that is successfully covered with ONE NEWSPAPER—for The Star—evening and Sunday—is read by practically every resident of, and sojourner in, Washington.

Those further details in which you may be specifically interested will be furnished upon request.

The Philadelphia Bulletin extends best wishes to all American advertising men and women who will attend the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in London.

This convention will focus the attention of European Manufacturers more than ever on the possibilities of distribution and sale of their commodities in the United States.

In all America there is perhaps no city better adapted to a "try out" by the European advertiser than Philadelphia.

Philadelphia is America's second largest port and goods from any portion of the globe can be landed with promptness and regularity.

Few of the world's markets offer so attractive an opportunity for profitable business as does America's third largest city,—Philadelphia.

WEMBLEY FIRST INTERNATIONAL A. A. C. W. MEET

History of Great Advertising Affiliation Told—Education and Vigilance Two Main Activities of Organization—Combined Membership 30,000

By EARLE PEARSON

Educational Director, Associated Advertising Clubs of the World.

IT has taken the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World just 10 years to realize its ambition of staging what is in fact as well as in name a truly international convention.

In June, 1914, the Association held its first convention outside the United States, meeting that year in Toronto, Canada. Conventions come and go, but there was something about that old Toronto convention that will make it stand out in the minds of the old standbys so long as their memories last.

It was a bit of an international convention, as a matter of fact; at least it had enough of the aspects of one to give the leaders of the Association the inspiration to want to hold a real one some day. And so there at Toronto, in the presence of a half dozen or so fine fellows from London, and perhaps two or three from out in Australia or New Zealand, and on British soil, the delegates voted to change the name to embrace the whole world. For 10 years it had been simply "of America," instead of "of the world."

Incidentally, may I say here that it was a real pleasure to me to be in Toronto only a few weeks ago and have a hand in the reorganizing of the old Advertising Club of Toronto and seeing it brought back once more into the Association. They will have three delegates at London next month.

Harry Tipper, general chairman of the London Program Committee, estimates that not more than 40 per cent of those who attend the London convention will be from the clubs in the United States and Canada, and yet the indications are that the registration will exceed all previous records. So it will in fact be international in point of attendance. The subjects of the speeches scheduled for the various sessions, particularly the general sessions, suggest the international flavor of the program.

We are often asked by strangers who come into headquarters office in New York just what is the Associated Advertising Clubs and I can imagine that the specific answer to that question may be sought by many readers of this special convention number of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

There are 3 forms of membership in the organization: Three hundred local Advertising Clubs scattered all the way from the British Isles and Cape Town, South Africa, on the East, through the United States and Canada and out into the Far East into Shanghai, China; Honolulu, Australia and New Zealand; twenty-five departments of advertising represented in twenty-five distinct organizations comprising the National Advertising Commission, and some 1,500 sustaining members, concerns and associations that contribute from $25 to $5,000 a year each to the support of the association. These three classes of members represent a combined membership of approximately 30,000.

The association has two main activities, commonly known as education and vigilance.

By education, we mean the educational work in the clubs and departments of the National Advertising Commission by which the members are learning through weekly meetings, study classes and by various means how to cope more successfully with the problems of advertising, sales, merchandising and distribution.

Vigilance is the corrective work. It is the police department in the advertising world. Unfortunately, there are swindlers, crooks and common every-day liars among men who use advertising to promote the sale of commodities, stocks and bonds, services and other things, just as there are pickpockets and robbers about over the world. So we have a department in the Associated Advertising Clubs to make it hard for the fellow who makes fraudulent, deceptive and misleading statements in his advertising. In addition to National Vigilance organization at headquarters in New York, the vigilance work is backed up by nearly 50 Better Business Bureaus in as many cities over the United States where trained bureau workers are engaged in a constant effort to make the advertising in their local communities dependable and to give the public increased confidence in it. As the public's confidence in advertising increases, so do the profits from advertising increase.

Headquarters office is the clearing house for all the activities of the Association. Through a well-managed Speakers Bureau, it is sending out more than a thousand offers of speakers to the clubs each month, and this service is greatly improving the standard of club meetings. It is offering an oportunity for an exchange of ideas with men from the outside, men who have demonstrated their ability to make money spent for advertising bring a profit.

Many clubs conduct regular educational work where the members come together once a week or so in study groups and pursue systematic study of various phases of advertising, selling and kindred subjects.

The affairs of the Association are administered by a president, elected annually from among the members, a secretary-treasurer and an Executive Committee of

EARLE PEARSON

5 other members, representing the clubs, the National Advertising Commission, the Sustaining Members, the women in advertising, and the seventh member is the immediate past president.

The Association is divided into 17 geographical districts, presided over by a District Chairman, who assists the staff at headquarters in the expansion of clubs and development of the work in his district.

In addition to the annual international convention, more than half of the districts hold annual district conventions. patterned somewhat after the larger convention, but giving emphasis to the problems of the particular section in which the district is located.

Also, perhaps half or more of the 25 departments of the National Advertising Commission have their annual coventions where attention is given to the problems peculiar to each group.

As stated, the Association is holding its first real international convention this year. The big problem ahead is one of expansion into new fields so that the membership may also reflect this international character.

A year ago, we had 2 clubs in the British Isles, the London Thirty Club, and the Advertising Club of Belfast, in Ulster, Ireland. Today, there are more than 30 in the British Isles and one also in South Africa.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

U. S. DOMINATES WORLD IN ADVERTISING

"AMERICAN business employs more advertising than that of any other country in the world. The number of national advertisers in this country is greater than in any country. The individual advertising appropriations are larger. The total volume of national advertising activity measured in dollars and in lines of advertising is larger. The volume of national advertising in this country for the year 1924 will be 20 per cent more than in 1923. The aggregate of advertising appropriations that the members of the American Association of Advertising Agencies will handle this year, in round numbers, makes a grand total of $300,000,000. That is, about 80 per cent of all the desirable national advertising. The local advertising in merchant lines will show about the same percentage of increase. Modern advertising methods in the national field are bringing local advertising into sympathy. This is evidenced in the improved character which is the reason for the continued growth of local advertising at about the same rate as that of national advertising. All the advertising in this country today is better advertising."—James O'Shaughnessy, Executive Secretary, American Association of Advertising Agencies.

JAMES O'SHAUGHNESSY

ATTORNEYS OF BUSINESS

"WHEN an individual or corporation goes to court to prevent a legal action, the skilled attorney guides each step of the way. When the modern manufacturer or business man seeks to place a message before the public he obtains the best advertising counsel and service obtainable for the shaping and execution of his plans. For the manufacturer or business man is presenting his case to the greatest of all juries—the public; a critical, sometimes finicky jury, subject to whims and fads, swayed by emotions, likes and dislikes. Advertising today is one of the most highly specialized profesions. The modern advertising agency spends large sums of money every year for exhaustive research work, not only along strictly advrtising lines, but also on commercial and industrial problems, finding out who is buying what, why they are buying and in what quantities; what the effects of certain selling policies may be—in fact, keeping a check on the entire trend of business and sentiment."—F. W. Strang, Strang & Prossr Agency, Seattle.

EVEN 5 YEAR OLDS REJECT LIES

"SOUND business has never yet been established upon lies; nor will be while the public has the intelligence of even a 5-year-old child. It required many years for people to realize this fundamental truth, but to the credit of reputable advertisers, they have not been slow to realize that false and misleading advertising does not pay. Merchants and manufacturers are finding that by what measure they conform to the exact truth, by how much newspapers are clearing their advertising columns of obliquity, by so much is the public gaining a confidence which results in the responses that make advretising profitable. So, as you advertise, be sure to select mediums in whose integrity readers have confidence, for they are the mediums which will bring you the largest returns."—Walter Sammis, Business Department, New York Times.

BRISBANE ANALYZES REPORTING

"YOU are in the right business, the only one really worth while. Everybody's business is your business, whereas your business is nobody's business. You can say what you like, nobody can answer you back—or if anybody answers you don't hear it. You are the eyes and ears of the public, which would be deaf and blind without you. And in addition to that, you are the public voice. Newspapers do for the nation what speech does for the individual. You are in the most ungrateful business, you have to perform every day. There is no phonograph to record your performance, and make it immortal. What you did yesterday doesn't count. Everything depends on what you can do today and tomorrow. That's the one disagreeable feature. And the older you grow usually the less you are worth. That's another disagreeable feature. But on the whole the newspaper is THE business."—Arthur Brisbane in Pen and Pencil News.

HIS DUTY TO KNOW

"A NEWSPAPER can't afford to accept questionable advertising at any price. It can't afford to take chances, because if its subscribers fall victims to a swindle scheme, they will always feel the paper largely responsible for their losses. The publisher of fake advertising can't escape responsibility on the ground that he didn't know it was fraudulent.. It is his duty to know; the subscriber has the right to rely on his paper for truthfulness in advertising, the same as in news."—Alfonso Johnson, President Northeast Missouri Press Association.

NEWSPAPERS PROSPEROUS

"TRAVEL through the country and find pessimism. I can't. Try and find anybody as hysterical over political affairs as some of our dear political leaders are in Washington. I can't. Try and find anybody of importance who thinks busines is going to be other than fully normal. I can't. Try and find a newspaper of consequence that is not well filled with first class advertising. I can't. Try and find a newspaper publisher of importance who acts worried. I can't. Try and find a smaller paper which isn't doing a business fully in keeping with the character and influence of his publication, I can't. —Walter H. Savory, Mergenthaler Linotype Company.

PUBLIC OFFICIALS AND THE PRESS

"I HAVE found in my experience as a public official that it pays to take the press into one's confidence. Whenever I have an item of news that I want withheld from publication I tell all the press about it, for that is the only way to safeguard news the publication of which, for a good reason, should be withheld. In all my experience I have never had such a confidence violated. I am quite sure the Maryland newspaper men are only a fair sample of those of the rest of the country in this respect. The public official who is trying to do his duty has nothing to fear from the American press of today."—Gov. Albert C. Ritchie of Maryland.

TWO DOLLAR DROP IN NEWSPRINT PRICES

Voluntary Reductions Made by Paper Companies — International Announces Policies Unchanged by Resignation of President Dodge

As foreshadowed in last week's EDITOR & PUBLISHER, newsprint prices have been reduced $2 a ton, making the price now $73 per ton instead of $75.

The cut follows more than a month of discussions both in Canada and the United States, and the final decision, it is understood, resulted from the definite announcements of several independents that they would take separate action. One of the independents, it is said, was a Wisconsin-Chicago group with an Ontario output in excess of 500 tons a day.

Spanish River made official announcement of the reduction in Montreal, July 13.

In a letter to clients dated July 14, J. L. Fearing, sales manager of the International Paper Company, gave notice of the cut, and explained his company's stand. There will be no change in policy as a result of P. T. Dodge's resignation as president and his election as chairman of the board, he said.

The letter follows:

"In conformity with our contract with you which calls for a fixed price for the calendar year 1924 (unless we announce a lower price during June, for the six months beginning July 1 following), we now announce a reduction of ten cents per 100 pounds and hereby advise you that paper delivered under the contract on and after July 1, will be billed accordingly.

"To any of our customers who may be disturbed by the vagaries of the spot market, in which some tonnage is being offered by mills with irresponsible sales policy—mills which in some instance charged 15c per pound or more during the war—we can only say that we were conservative then and do not wish to depart from a conservative policy now. If prices should drop to a basis that is unprofitable, the reaction will be great. The pendulum will swing one way as far as it does the other. The interests of the publishers and of the paper manufacturers alike require that efficient paper mills shall receive fair and reasonable prices for their product.

"European paper made under a depreciated currency and under labor conditions far below the American standard is hardly fair competition. We are protecting our labor with drastic immigration laws, yet in the case of newsprint paper we admit the product of cheap European labor without any protection whatever. With the gradual return of European normalcy and an increase in the purchasing power of European nations for home consumption, the imports of paper from Europe are showing signs of curtailment.

"Many of our customers have asked whether there will be any change in our attitude toward them as a result of P. T. Dodge's resignation as president and his election as chairman of the Board. The policies inaugurated by Mr. Dodge, frequently in the face of untold difficulties, will be continued by his successor, Archibald R. Graustein.

"The resources of the company will be further developed; our mill at Trois Rivieres, Quebec, will soon be enlarged; and in due time other mills, protected with ample timber reserves and ample waterpower, already owned by us, will be constructed. It is hoped to increase the efficiency of this company; to go ahead; to make it more and more worthy of your confidence."

The paper companies, according to an EDITOR & PUBLISHER informant are in a good position to make the concession.

International Paper Company is now running at about 90 per cent capacity, an executive declared. It is understood this concern is waiting to see how their newsprint will be taken up at the lower price. If the demand fails to meet the supply, curtailment of certain mills must follow.

HEARST ISSUES BIG BRIEF IN A. P. PROXY FIGHT

Gannett and Patterson Give Out Additional Statements—Claims Laid Before Association Membership in Preparation for July 31 Special Meeting

ON behalf on the Baltimore News and Rochester Journal and Post Express, protesting against the applications for Associated Press memberships by the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union, which will be decided by a 'proxy convention" on July 31, William Randolph Hearst this week caused to be issued an exhaustive brief, while Paul Patterson, Baltimore Evening Sun and Frank E. Gannett, Rochester Times-Union, issued additional statements.

The Hearst brief makes a heavy book of 75 pages, handsomely printed, and contains several facsimile reproductions of letters.

The foreword sets up the premise that since 1849 the Associated Press has "thrived on the principle of mutuality," the keystone being the "preservation and protection of each member's right," the "inviolate exclusiveness" of members' rights and then says: "You are now asked to vote whether or not this traditional lifegiving policy shall be abandoned or shall be maintained."

The foreword proceeds, as follows:

"If the right of a member to protest and keep out of membership a direct competitor in his own city shall now be denied—then no man who owns an Associated Press membership can consider that as an asset in the valuation of his property.

"A vote to admit any newspaper to membership in violation of another member's right to avoid such competition is a vote to overthrow the principle on which the Associated Press was built and on which alone it has survived and thrived.

"This book is a plea to every member of the Associated Press to preserve the asset value of his property."

The effort of the Baltimore Evening Sun and Rochester Times-Union to obtain A. P. membership last April, the brief declares is a situation unique in the history of the A. P. "The applicants were asking the membership of the Associated Press to grant them for nothing the same privileges which Mr. Hearst had paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to acquire," the brief said, and added:

"Three out of the fifteen directors of the Associated Press, each of whom is a competitor of Mr. Hearst in his respective city, arose on the floor of the annual meeting to advocate that the members of the Associated Press vote these franchises to the applicants in spite of the protests of Mr. Hearst's franchise-holding papers in these cities and to the injury of their property rights.

"The Board of Directors, even on this occasion, refused to make any recommendations, and never before, under similar circumstances, had any director recommended that such an application for membership be granted and a member's protest be overridden.

"Previous action of the Associated Press on such applications had always resulted in a denial of the application and in sustaining the rights of protest where the application was for a franchise in the same city.

"It was very apparent that there was directed a drive against the Hearst newspapers at this annual meeting of the Associated Press and an effort was made by speakers for the applicants to becloud the issue by injecting into the discussion much about Mr. Hearst's ownership of a competing afternoon news service.

"Mr. C. P. J. Mooney, Vice-President of the Associated Press and the member representing the Memphis Commercial-Appeal, pointed out the advantage of such a situation rather than the disadvantage, when he said: 'The matter of other press associations is a thing aside. I am afraid if there were only one news association in the United States following the present temper of the unrestrained minds of our lawmakers that it (the Associated Press) would immediately be declared to be a common carrier and the value that we put in it would be destroyed.'

"The point was raised by speakers for the gentlemen who had filed applications for membership that the Hearst members featured items of news furnished by the International News Service and 'played down' items furnished by the Associated Press.

"It was this point that was especially stressed by Mr. Paul Patterson of the Baltimore Sun, in his plea for a franchise. He furnished the members one copy of the Baltimore News, 20 days old, showing how it had featured International News matter, and pointed out that the Associated Press credit lines were always marked 'A.P.' and never 'Associated Press' spelled out.

"But two of the directors of the Associated Press, even while they espoused the cause of the Baltimore Evening Sun, disclaimed any desire to criticise the Baltimore News for the manner in which it handled the news furnished it by the Associated Press or by any other news association.

"They did, however, directly charge that under Hearst's control the interests of all Associated Press members in their rights to news from Baltimore might suffer.

"How could these interests suffer? Obviously only in one way, and that is if the members in other cities fail to receive adequate news reports from Baltimore which news reports must in all instances be furnished by the Baltimore member."

It is asked, what local covering has to do with the display given A. P. or telegraph news and, in reference to the ability of the Hearst newspapers at Baltimore and Rochester to cover the news for A. P. the brief contends they now have the largest and best staffs in their history, which service is available to A. P. and cites that Frank B. Noyes, asked on the floor of the last annual meeting if there had been complaint against anything the Baltimore News had done or failed to do, admitted there had been no complaint.

Under the sub-title "Do our by-laws mean what they say or are they elastic," the Hearst protestants then quote the A. P. by-laws, article 3, section 1, 'Admission of Members':

> "Members may be elected by the affirmative vote of not less than four-fifths of all the members of the corporation at any regular meeting of the members of the corporation or at a special meeting called for that purpose. Such votes may be cast in person or by proxy."

President Noyes is then quoted as having said at the annual meeting: "If there is any assumption that the by-laws by giving a right of protest—which right of protest runs against the Board of Directors acting and they alone—that the provision that provides that four-fifths of those present at an annual meeting can elect—if there is any assumption that that is not in the by-laws in good faith I shall be obliged to correct that assumption at once."

Victor Lawson, Chicago Daily News, Director of the Associated Press, is quoted as having said, "There is the right that the Association can exercise its own judgment in respect of its own rights as an association by action in the membership meeting here by four-fifths vote."

The brief says: "And when the representatives of Mr. Hearst called attention to these very apparent departures from the plain English of the by-laws in a letter addressed to Mr. Frederick Roy Martin, general manager of the Associated Press, Mr. Martin replied, under date of May 22, 1924: "The construction placed on the by-laws has always been four-fifths of those present at a meeting and not four-fifths of the entire membership was requisite for an election of an applicant over an unwaived protest."

The brief declares that the A. P. "being organized as a club and to show it was not intended to make a closed corporation, they had to provide a specific means of admitting members, so they wrote this provision of the by-laws to cover that point and still made the overriding of a protest almost an impossibility.

"Now it appears to suit a present purpose to alter this by-law, which is very clear, into meaning a four-fifths vote of the members present at an annual meeting or a special meeting. And this means that only a quorum or a majority of all the members need be present either in person or by proxy.

"Under the construction of Messrs. Noyes, Lawson and Martin, this by-law could operate to override a protest with less than a majority of the votes of the membership of the Association in favor of such action.

"It is a simple matter of arithmetic. There are 1,208 voting members of the Associated Press. A quorum necessary to do business would be 605 present in person or by proxy. Four-fifths of 605 is 484.

"Therefore, under the distortion of section I, article 3, of the by-laws, it would be possible to destroy the property rights of a member of the association by 484 votes out of 1,208.

"Do you believe that forty per cent of the membership should decide what the by-laws say eighty per cent must decide?

"Are you willing to subject the decision on your own property rights to less than one-half of the vote of the membership?"

The protestants then launch into the matter of voting proxies and ask: "Did you know how yours was to be used and voted?" It is declared that, despite alleged misuse of certain proxies voted by Advisory Boards at the annual meeting, the vote on Baltimore was announced by the chair as 423 in favor of the Baltimore Sun application and 110 opposed, and "on this announcement the election had failed, either on a strict reading of the by-laws which required four-fifths of the total membership vote or even on four-fifths of a quorum which required 484 votes.

"There were only 533 votes cast out of the total membership of 1,208, being 72 less than a quorum and only 423 in favor of the applicant. Yet the chair announced that 425 votes could elect.

"How does that announcement square with Section I of Article 3 of the By-Laws?

"The Baltimore applicant demanded a roll call and, in the interim, many members having left the hall, the chairman, for the first time, indicated his doubt as to the presence of a quorum.

"The Hearst representatives were anxious to have a full and free expression of the membership of the association and thereupon agreed to a mail vote, promising in the event that four-fifths of the membership voted in favor of the Baltimore and Rochester applicants the Hearst newspapers in these cities would waive their protest and the Board of Directors could then proceed legally to elect the applicants to membership.

"This suggestion finally was accepted by the directors and by the applicants.

"However, the counsel of the Associated Press, Mr. John W. Davis, subsequently furnished the directors of the Associated Press with an opinion that this mail vote would be illegal and should not be taken. We quote from Mr. Davis's opinion:

> " 'This waiver, however, is to be preceded by an electoral canvass of the members of the Association taken in a method not provided by the by-laws and surrounded by conditions which any member of the Association would be at liberty to ignore.
> " 'No stipulation which you or any other officer of the Association might enter in its name could possibly bind the members to submit to or participate in a referendum of this extra-legal character. I cannot but think that to attempt to take a vote by such machinery would be not only abortive, but would establish a most undesirable precedent.
> " 'It must not be forgotten that not only the rights of the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union on the one hand, and the Baltimore News and the Rochester Journal and Post Express on the other, are involved, but also the rights of all other members of the Associated Press.' "

"On May 28, 1924, the Executive Committee of the Associated Press met to consider this letter from their general counsel and decided to act upon the advice given by Mr. Davis. They thereupon voted to call a special meeting of the Associated Press for July 31, 1924, at which all members will be asked to vote either in person or by proxy for or against the applications of the Baltimore Evening Sun and Rochester Times-Union for membership.

"Your vote at that election is going to make Associated Press history.

"If you vote these applicants in and override the protest you establish a precedent that practically nullifies your Associated Press membership's asset value to your property. The same thing can happen to you.

"If you sustain the protest and vote against these applicants you reassert the principle that the Associated Press members are bound to each other in a compact of mutual protection of each other's rights and privileges."

Adolph Ochs is quoted in the brief as having said: "A Baltimore membership is worth thousands of dollars" and the protestants ask, "Why give it to the Baltimore Sun for nothing?" It is then charged that Mr. Ochs gave the A. P. members a wrong impression of Mr. Hearst's attitude and the minutes of the annual meeting are quoted to the effect that Mr. Ochs expressed confidence that Mr. Hearst, if the situation were made clear to him, would not protest against the Baltimore and Rochester applications.

A facsimile letter written by Mr. Hearst is then introduced, reading:

"I note that Mr. Ochs stated at the Associated Press meeting, at which the question of granting Associated Press franchises to the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union was discussed, that I was so 'generous' and 'magnanimous' that if I were present I 'would not enter a protest against the application of the Baltimore or the Rochester papers.'

"Mr. Ochs further said that the Hearst papers had shown 'admirable loyalty' with respect to the Associated Press Service. And Mr. Ochs continued:

" 'It is my firm conviction that if all the facts in these cases were made known to Mr. Hearst, you would find that he would waive his protest.'

"I simply want to say that all the facts in the situation have been made known to me, and I certainly do not want to waive my protest.

"There is a very distinct difference between being 'generous' or even 'magnanimous' towards one's associates and abandoning one's legal rights and guaranteed privileges.

"There is a very marked difference between showing 'admirable loyalty' to the Associated Press service and showing a very senseless lack of appreciation of the value of its exclusive franchises.

"As an owner of the Associated Press franchises or memberships I certainly would not want to create a precedent, or constitute a precedent, by which the value of those memberships would be materially diminished.

"If Mr. Ochs had actually thought that if the situation were made clear to me I 'would not enter a protest against the application of the Baltimore or the Rochester papers,' he could easily have called me up on the telephone and assured himself of the facts, and made the Associated Press meeting on this question and the subsequent proceedings unnecessary.

"And, therefore, I am reasonably confident that Mr. Ochs must have known that I, like other Associated Press members, considered the privileges of that association too valuable to be lightly abandoned.

"As a matter of fact, I buy papers because they have Associated Press franchises, and put especial value upon exclusive Associated Press privileges.

"Furthermore, I do not buy any papers that have not Associated Press franchises, and consequently I am becoming more and more interested in the Associated Press all the time, and more and more concerned in its success through enlightened self interest.

"To deprive me of my rights in the Associated Press and my interest in the Associated Press and my loyalty to the Associated Press does not seem to me to be a good thing to do, either from my point of view or the point of view of the membership generally.

"Moreover, I doubt if it is a good thing to do, it being so contrary to all previous interpretations of the constitution and by-laws of the association.

"In fact, there seems to me to be no reason for these proceedings except the antagonism of certain powerful influences in the association.

"If these influences are to be exercised against the advantage of the individual or the membership generally in one case, there is no knowing what circumstances may arise to cause those powerful influences to be similarly exercised in another case.

"Therefore, I am distinctly opposed to any such action as is contemplated in this special meeting of the Associated Press—primarily for reasons affecting my own interests, and secondly for reasons affecting the general welfare of the general organization and the rights and privileges of the members.

"Sincerely,

"WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST."

The brief then declares: 'Hearst has millions of dollars invested in A. P. memberships—he never got one without paying the price"—and lists his A. P. acquisitions, including San Antonio Light.

The news service of the Baltimore News is then set forth and it is declared that the A. P. gets better service from Baltimore than heretofore.

It is declared that Baltimore News and Hearst newspapers have always been loyal to the A. P. and the testimony of President Noyes and Mr. Ochs is cited from the minutes of the last meeting.

At this point in the brief the statement of Col. Robert Ewing, New Orleans States and Shreveport Times, also found in the minutes of the last meeting, are quoted to the effect: "It's just a question of whose ox is being gored" according to the brief."

Further excerpts are made of remarks by C. P. J. Mooney, Memphis Commercial-Appeal, summarized in the brief as "We are asked to violate a precedent in force since incorporation."

Frank E. Gannett, the Rochester applicant, is quoted as having said at the meeting:

"'I do not want to do anything that might jeopardize these rights. I cannot afford to apply for membership for the Rochester Times-Union if the granting of such an application would in the slightest degree weaken the rights my papers have in other cities.'"

The brief then says: "Does any member of the Associated Press doubt, if a precedent is established now overriding the protest rights of the Rochester Journal and Post Express in favor of the Times-Union, that this may not at some future time react upon him as an Associated Press franchise holder? Does he not realize that such a precedent will be used against him?

"Mr. Hearst paid more than a quarter of a million dollars for the Rochester Post Express. He did not buy either its plant or any of its equipment. Its circulation and advertising were inconsequential. He bought it because it had an Associated Press franchise."

William A. De Ford, chief counsel for the Hearst organization, who represented the Baltimore News at the A. P. meeting, is then quoted. He asked the question, the brief shows: "Would you vote yourself competition in your own town?" He charged that the application had not been made on its merits, and added:

"It is made on the shadowy and unfair foundation of an appeal to personal prejudice, and nothing else. And I am appealing to you, gentlemen, as members of this association to act as members of the association. If you have any prejudices towards the Hearst organization or any of the newspapers represented in that organization, your first duty to this association is to divorce yourself from that prejudice and from that feeling which my friend has so skilfully appealed to. That is an obligation that you owe to yourselves, and it is an obligation that you owe to this association."

There is a huge volume of supporting evidence, including letters from Paul Block and Charles S. Diehl, of San Antonio Light, former general manager of A. P. in New York, declaring that granting of the applications named cause 'inculculable losses to many established newspaper properties." The whole matter is set forth in a searching analysis and final summary.

Col. Ewing is quoted as having said at the April meeting:

"I imagine that if this was an application in some of the cities of some of these gentlemen who are clapping so vigorously, they would be singing a different kind of a tune, and I think we ought to look at it from that standpoint.

"I doubt very much—with all due respect to Mr. Patterson—I dobut very much whether if the present owners of the Baltimore News owned the Baltimore American, and the Baltimore American did not have a right to use the Associated Press franchise—I doubt very much whether Mr. Patterson would vote to give them that right, or even swap it to them for the right to print the Associated Press in the Evening Sun, if the News should want to have the Associated Press right in the evening, and not have it on The American in the morning."

PAUL PATTERSON'S ADDITIONAL STATEMENT

EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week received the following telegram:

"To Editor & Publisher:

"The Evening Sun's brief which you were kind enough to print in full in last week's issue of the Editor & Publisher covers our case thoroughly. Particularly we desire to call attention to the letter of President Frank B. Noyes of the Associated Press and to the statements of Mr. Ochs and Mr. Lawson, all of which are contained in our brief as published by you. We might also call attention to the fact that since our brief was prepared Mr. Hearst has secured an exclusive Associated Press membership in Milwaukee through purchase of the Milwaukee Sentinel.

"I should like also to point out that it is the Evening Sun which is the applicant for membership and not the Baltimore Sun, as erroneously stated in the brief signed by Mr. Brisbane and Mr. Gray and published last week in Editor & Publisher. The Baltimore Sun was one of the charter members of the Associated Press.

"Paul Patterson,
"Baltimore Evening Sun."

FRANK E. GANNETT MAKES STATEMENT

IN a statement made public this week Frank E. Gannett, editor and proprietor of the Rochester Times-Union, applicant for Associated Press Membership said:

"I have been agreeably surprised by the number that have given me assurance of their support, and have even sent in their proxies, in the short time since we began to put our case before the members of the Associated Press.

"This support has come from all sections of the country from newspapers in the smaller communities and from great metropolitan dailies. I was confident of the warm backing of my friends of the New York State Press, but their friendship and support in this matter have been proven so clearly as to make that alone worth the effort we are putting forth.

"I am more and more confident of the outcome. There is every evidence that the real issue is clearly understood, and that the members of the Associated Press expect to meet it.

"The real issue is, as I have tried to put it in my statement to the members, 'Shall the Associated Press be Hearstized.' I believe the answer of the membership in voting admission to the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union, will be emphatically 'no.' One of the members, in writing to tell me that he was sending his proxy wrote, 'Mr. Brisbane's wired protest did not particularly impress me,' and none of the Hearst arguments has particularly impressed anyone, except with the fact that Mr. Hearst is making a strong effort to retain exclusive afternoon membership in the two important news centers of Baltimore and Rochester.

"If Mr. Hearst does that, he can go on, as he already has in San Antonio and Milwaukee, and seek control of the news sources in other important cities. As the Associated Press, in competition with Hearst's International News Service, has to depend upon Hearst for its news, it will be Hearstized to an extent that no loyal member can contemplate with anything but dread, and I speak as a loyal member, because my newspapers have six A. P. memberships in cities other than Rochester.

"The only argument that Hearst has put forth are that of 'president' and the impairment of his own asset in the Rochester Journal and Post Express. The latter consideration, in any case, is not to be weighed as against the welfare of the Associated Press as a whole, but it would impress one more forcibly were there evidence forthcoming that the Rochester Journal and Post Express appreciated its A. P. membership by adequate use of A. P. news.

"As for 'precedent' evidence is coming to us in every mail that this argument is not influencing members of the A. P. They realize that a new issue is raised, that must be met on new ground. They realize that the only precedent that would be set here would be a good precedent, one that could always be followed with advantage to the Associated Press and for the good service of its members.

"For the precedent is that the Associtaed Press will always encourage the granting of membership to a responsible and ably managed newspaper that will give it an independent source of news in a community controlled by Mr. Hearst, or by any one else who is more interested in his own competing wire service than he is in the Associated Press.

"That is the issue on which no loyal member of the A. P. need fear precedent. It will not affect the legitimate protest rights of a single loyal member, as I believe a sufficient number will realize to vote membership to the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester-Times Union.

"I have been at a loss to understand the opposition of Mr. Winn, of the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle. That newspaper, an old and an able journal, in the morning field, has no protest rights in the case of the Times Union's application. Mr. Winn's letter to the A. P. membership ignores the Hearst issue. It says nothing of the vital fact that the A. P. is wholly dependent for its afternoon reports out of Rochester on the Hearst paper. Nothing that Mr. Winn could suggest would alter that fact, except to give membership to the Times Union.

"If Mr. Winn's Democrat and Chronicle contemplated publishing an after noon edition, which I think highly improbable, it would itself have to apply for A. P. membership in the afternoon field. We would then be just where we now are, except that Mr. Winn would be the applicant instead of Mr. Gannett.

"Mr. Winn says in his letter that the Democrat and Chronicle 'by its own support and prestige has given to the Associated Press a standing in this territory that no other news agency has ever enjoyed.' I was under the impression that the entire membership of the Associated Press, in this and other countries had contributed to its prestige everywhere.

"I shall not invite invidious comparisons by discussing the extent to which the Times Union would contribute to that prestige in this territory. If I did not, however, believe that we would bring strength to the Associated Press, I should not have applied for membership. We have the largest circulation in New York State, outside of New York City, and Buffalo, we have a large and experienced and able and devoted staff, we have ample equipment, we have a vigorous policy of expansion and community service. This is in the afternoon field, and should not impair Mr. Winn's asset in the Democrat and Chronicle, in the morning field, but add to it.

"I can understand Mr. Hearst's opposition. I anticipated it. But I cannot understand Mr. Winn's job. I thought he would have the best interests of the A. P. at heart. My application does not affect him except to make his A. P. membership more valuable than ever before.

"I am, however, so confident of the justice of our case that I believe the membership of the Associated Press will see with us in this matter, and that all but a small minority will vote for the admission of both the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times Union to membership."

BACKS JOURNALISTS' FUND

Le Petit Journal, Paris, Launches Plan to Aid Veterans

By G. Langelaan

(Paris Correspondent, Editor & Publisher)

Paris, June 11.—Original means for raising funds for old age pensions for newspaper men have been proposed in Le Petit Journal by André Billy. His plan is that on one day every year newspaper readers should be called upon to pay one cent more for their journals. This extra cent should be devoted to a fund for old journalists. In appealing to the readers of Le Petit Journal to support such a scheme M. Billy says: "At present you you three sous for your paper. Three sous to be informed of everything that takes place in every part of the world, you will admit is not dear. A book which can tell you only an insignificant story and which has the serious defect of not being true, you do not hesitate to pay six and seven francs for. And to see the latest play you will pay as much as twenty francs. For three sous, the price of your paper, you get the drama and pathos of the whole world Really, dear reader, it is giving things away. Now, tell me, friend, if once a year I asked you to pay one small, humble sou more for your paper, could you have the heart to refuse, if this extra sou was to be used to brighten the days of old journalists?"

News Man in Plane Crash

Norman Fuller, staff artist of the Denver Rocky Mountain News miraculously escaped death when an airplane belonging to a flying circus brought to Denver by his newspaper crashed 3,000 feet to the ground last week. Except for the coolness and skill with which the pilot, Captain Lowell Yerex, Royal Flying Corps VIII, landed the plane from its tail spin both Fuller and Yelex would have been instantly killed. Both men are recovering in a local hospital.

Hutson Sailing for London

William K. Hutson, editor of the Advertising Club News, weekly publication of the Advertising Club of New York, sails June 21 for Paris and London. After attending the A. A. C. W. international convention at Wembley, July 13 to 18, he will visit France for two weeks, returning from Cherbourg on the S. S. Berengaria August 2.

NEWS WRITERS READY FOR DEMOCRATIC MEET

More Than 800 Correspondents Will Invade Madison Square Garden Next Week—14 Stations to Broadcast Speeches—Elaborate Entertainment Program for Visiting Newspaper Men

ALL is in readiness at Madison Square Garden, New York, for the National Democratic Convention, which opens June 24, and political writers from all parts of the country have already invaded Manhattan to fill columns with preliminary predictions. When the gavel resounds at the opening, it is expected that more than 800 working newspaper men will be on hand to cover the proceedings.

CHARLES HAMBIDGE

As visiting newspaper men arrive in New York, they are invited to register at the Newspaper Club, 130 W. 42nd street, and state their preference in the way of amusements.

General entertainment planned by the Newspaper Club, under the direction of Charles Hambidge of the New York Times, chairman, entertainment committee and Christopher Bohnsack of the City News Association will commence Friday, June 20.

On that date all newspaper men in New York to cover the convention were to go to the Hotel Shelburne, Coney Island, for a supper to start at 10 o'clock in the evening. Addresses by Mayor John F. Hylan and Commissioner Grover A. Whalen were on the program. Gene Fowler, of the New York American, and president of the Newspaper Club was to preside.

After the supper, the visitors were to be met by club members and a parade held down the board walk to Luna Park.

There at midnight lights were to be extinguished a short while to allow the public to leave, and then re-lighted and the park turned over exclusively to newspaper men.

Each night at 12 o'clock during the convention, entertainment by Broadway stars will be staged in the dining room of the Newspaper Club, which has been enlarged for the purpose.

Trips to the Stock Exchange, the Statue of Liberty, a tour of the harbor, and other excursions have been planned. Seven clubs in the metropolitan area have agreed to allow visiting newspaper men the privileges of their golf courses and tennis courts.

One of the features of the newspaper men's entertainment program will be a series of baseball games to be played between the Newspaper Club team and a nine picked from among the visiting political writers for the baseball championship of the newspaper world. Christie Bohnsack is manager of the club team. Other players include Jim Durkin of the New York Telegram and Evening Mail, Philip Payne, managing editor of the Daily News, Philip Brown, a publicity man, captain of the team, Charles Bayer of the World, Milton V. O'Connell of the Herald, Victor Kubes of the American, F. D. Benham of the World, Thomas Gammack of the Sun.

Another feature will be a welcome to newspaper men which will be written on the sky by an aviator, arranged for by Henry A. Bruno, a club member. Mr. Bruno will also arrange joy rides for visiting newspaper men in airplanes.

For service to newspaper men, a well appointed work room has been established on the ground floor of the Newspaper Club. Two pages will be in attendance. Four telegraph wires have been installed.

For the comfort and convenience of the thousand or more news-gatherers who will attend the convention, the New York World in conjunction with the Baltimore Sun has arranged a commodious Convention Newspaper Club in the basement of Madison Square Garden.

With the co-operation of Elliott Cobb, the architect in charge of re-modelling the Garden, and John T. Prior, the superintendent of construction, a large rectangular space has been walled off with compo-board panels 10 feet high.

The C. H. Koster Company, which has the contract for the Convention decorations, has tastefully draped the ceiling of the club room with Ivory cheesecloth in an artistic arrangement. The walls have been decorated with sunbursts of American flags, eighteen pairs of 6-foot flags being used for the purpose.

The club room has been furnished by William Birns. Cushioned walnut benches line the walls, while scattered about the room are several refectory tables and numerous confortable chairs, smoking stands and hat trees. Three telephone booths have been installed.

At the north end of the club room David Lantenberg, the Convention caterer will operate a lunch counter where coffee and sandwiches will be available for the newswriters at all hours without charge.

Two large signs facing the two corridors read "Convention Newspaper Club of the World and the Baltimore Sun." Along the corridors are the various work rooms provided for newspapers.

Just inside the door of the club room will be an information desk in charge of Miss Miriam Phair. Convention writers visiting the Club will be requested to register here, giving their New York address, as well as the paper they represent.

Stanley M. Reynolds, managing editor, Baltimore Sun has had charge of arranging the Club for his paper, and William Johnston for the World.

During the Convention the Sun will be represented at the Club by Mr. Mc Cartney, George Combs, George Little and N. L. Sydnor, and the World by Miss Phair and Murray Riddle.

Every effort has been made to give a club atmosphere to the quarters. Copies of all editions of the World and the Sun, both morning and evening editions, will be delivered daily. A complete file of all the New York newspapers will be kept, and there will be a supply of useful reference books including the World Almanac Convention supplement, and the World Convention Guides.

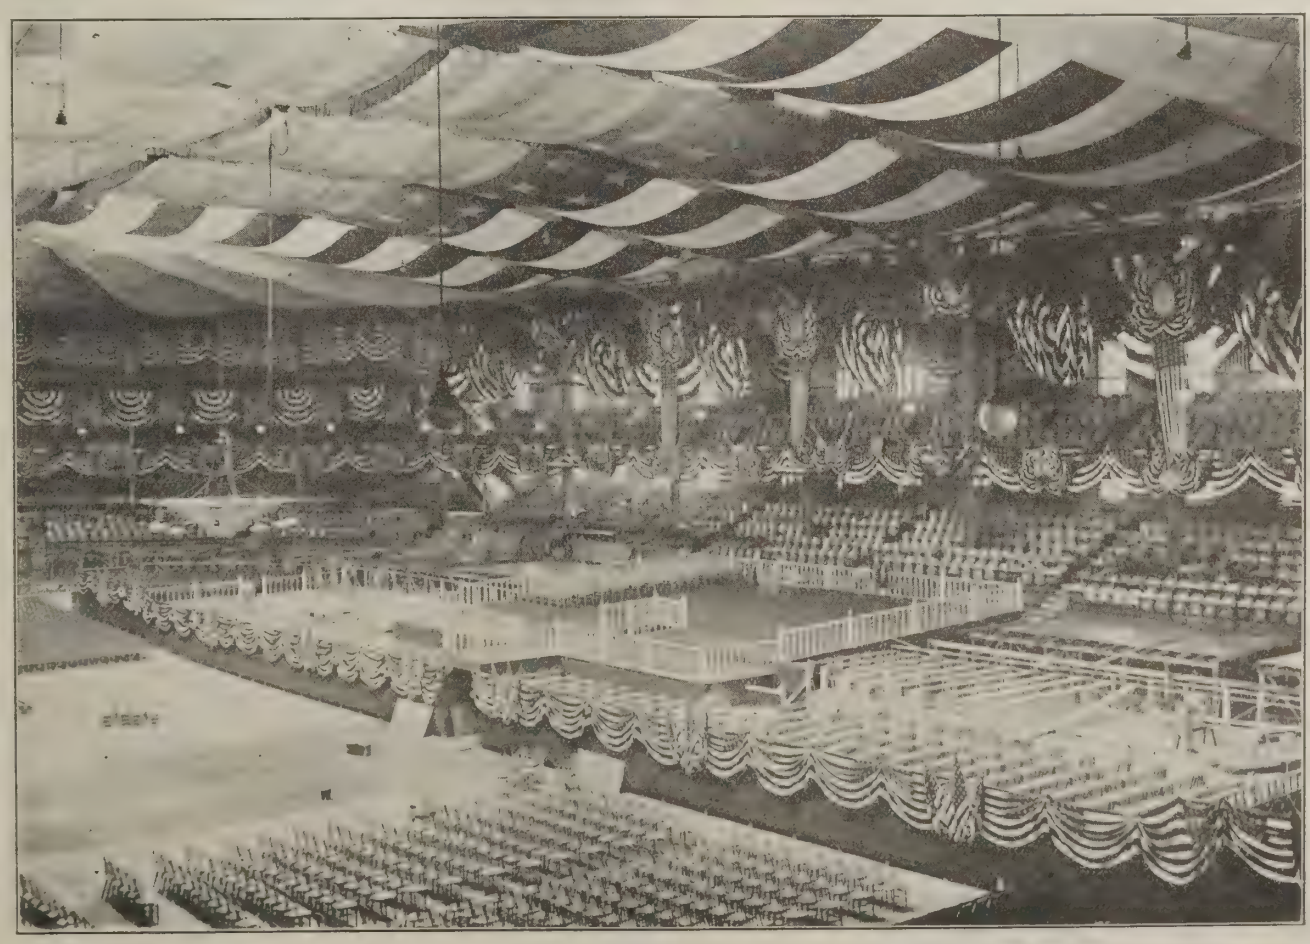
A general invitation has been extended to all newspaper and syndicate representatives at the Convention to make the Convention Newspaper Club a headquarters and a lounging place when they are off duty at the Garden.

First inspection of the Garden since its reconstruction was made June 16 by members of the Democratic National Committee.

The platform for the chairman, speakers and 300 prominent Democrats was then completed and presented an attractive appearance with its white ornamented balustrade. Immediately on each side is the press section, containing 800 seats. In front of the platform and covering the body of the floor of the Garden are the seats for more than 1,200 delegates while to the east and west of these are the seats for the alternates.

Decorations consist almost exclusively of American flags, draped and festooned about the balconies and galleries. Girders supporting the roof are completely concealed by a tremendous American flag, which forms a billowy ceiling extending from one side of the Garden to the other. The State arms and the city colors are also used.

The Garden has been newly painted throughout. The great circle of boxes has been finished in blue to give a contrast with the rest of the interior. The restaurant in the Garden is being made over completely. The walls which have been stained and discolored for years are being painted. David Lantenberg, the concessionaire, has installed a complete new kitchen equipment.



More telephone and telegraphic equipment than has ever been put in any one New York building has been installed. One telephone cable contains 600 pairs of wires.

Various press associations which have leased wires from the American Telephone and Telegraph Company will be connected directly with the Garden, for service to all sections of the country. In some cases newspapers have leased wires to run directly from the Garden to their offices. In other cases wires are being strung from the Garden to the temporary headquarters that newspapers are to establish for convention work.

Two instruments on the desk of the Chairman of the convention will enable him to communicate at once with strategic points in the Garden, and arrangements have been made to place loud speakers at various points in the hall.

The installation of telephone facilities for the public is no small item. The Garden Theatre, generally used as a separate hall, is to be turned into a lounge and smoking room for the convention period and the main telephone equipment for public use will be located there. There will be "banks" of telephones in the basement for the press and several banks of slot machine telephones in various rest rooms and other vantage points about the hall. Operators will be on hand at many places to arrange long distance as well as local calls.

Fourteen stations have already arranged to broadcast the proceedings of the Democratic National Convention. They cover a territory from Buffalo to Atlanta and from Madison Square Garden decorated for Democratic National Convention, showing press sections extending out on both sides of the speakers' platform, where 800 working newspaper men will record the convention proceedings. The platform will seat 300 prominent Democrats behind its white, ornamented balustrade. Delegates will sit in front and alternates to east and west.

Schenectady to Kansas City and St. Louis. It is under consideration also to broadcast for the Southwest from Dallas or Fort Worth, Texas.

WJZ will broadcast here and send its service by Western Union to be broadcast by WGY from Schenectady. All other out-of-town stations will receive the proceedings over long-distance telephone lines from the WEAF station of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company. This service is being furnished to broadcasting stations at cost.

Most of the broadcasting will be the sounds collected by sets of microphones at the speaker's stand. Graham McNamee, the announcer, will be in a glass cage where he can watch the proceedings, receive information from experts and keep up a running explanation for WEAF and the other broadcasting stations on the long-distance telephone lines. J. Andrew White, in another small glass house, will do the talking for WJZ and WGY.

Down in the basement of the Garden, the area has been partitioned off, forming a semi-circle of offices, which will be headquarters of the various press associations and large newspapers.

Assignment of seats in the telegraphic press section at the Democratic National Convention, made by the Standing Committee of Correspondents, James L. Wright, chairman, follows:

Forgey and Norris Take Control of Ashland Independent

B. F. Forgey and J. T. Norris, June 9, announced their purchase of the stock in the Ashland Publishing Company, publishers of the Ashland (Ky.) Daily Independent, owned by Davis E. Geiger, Paul J. Hughes, Ben Williamson and John E. Buckingham. Geiger was advertising manager and Hughes was editor of the Independent.

The price paid was not divulged but it was understood to be in the neighborhood of $150,000.

Forgey has been connected with the Independent for many years, having owned it formerly with G. F. Friel and George P. Ginn. Three years ago the company was reorganized, Mr. Ginn retiring and Messrs. Geiger, Hughes, Norris, Williamson and Buckingham taking stock.

Mr. Hughes has announced the purchase from the new owners of the commercial printing department of the Independent, the equipment of which will be moved to a new location, new machinery added and new branches opened.

The Independent is Ashland's only newspaper.

Prints "Old Boston" Edition

The Boston Daily Advertiser, on June 16, in connection with the Women's Municipal League's pageant and program, "Old Boston Days on Beacon Hill," distributed a special 100-year anniversary addition, included with each copy of which was a facsimile copy of the Boston Daily Advertiser of June 16, 1824. A feature of this special edition was the two solid pages of advertising by concerns which had been in business for long periods, the "oldest" since 1729, the "youngest" since 1898.

Vote on Joint Meeting

A vote is being taken among the members of the Northern New York Press Association to determine whether a joint meeting will be held at Alexandria Bay with the New York State Press Association, which plans to hold its annual session July 10, 11 and 12. Elaborate preparations are being made by the State association for the gathering. The Crossman House will be headquarters for the editors, it has been announced by President P. N. Blossom. A program is being prepared by J. W. Shaw of Elmira, executive secretary.

Medill School Graduates 24

Medill School of Journalism of Northwestern University awarded 24 degrees to students at Commencement exercises Monday, June 16. Of this number 4 were given the degree of Master of Science, 19 the degree Bachelor of Science in Journalism and to 3 students the diploma in journalism for 4 years' work in the evening classes was awarded for the first time this year.

Minnesota Publisher Dies at 82

Amherst Willoughby Blakely, 82, publisher and editor of the Rochester (Minn.) Daily Post and Record and the oldest active newspaper man in Minnesota, died June 11. He had been in the newspaper business at Rochester 64 years except a period of 7 years in the 60's, when he was city editor of the Chicago Post.

No Billboards Wanted

Aroused by the increase in advertising billboards which spoiled vistas of mountain and turquoise sea, the women of Honolulu notified the merchants of the Hawaiian Islands that they would buy no goods so advertised, and down they came.

Two Thirds of the Motor Cars in America Are Made In Detroit

OF 4,012,000 automobiles and commercial trucks manufactured in America in 1923, Detroit, alone, produced 2,724,183—more than two-thirds of the total.

Detroit is not only the automotive center of the world, the home of nearly all of America's financially powerful and quantity producing automobile companies, but it also supplies automotive parts and accessories and bodies used in the making of practically every automobile produced elsewhere in the United States.

Detroit is consequently an industrial center without a peer in America—a city of 1,247,000, with the highest wage rate available anywhere.

To the advertiser Detroit offers a unique opportunity. Though fourth in population in the United States, Detroit is easily coverable with one newspaper, The Detroit News with a circulation—the largest in the State of Michigan—sufficient to provide a copy for every home in the City.

In fact, no other city of Detroit's size can be so thoroughly covered by one newspaper as Detroit is by The News, and few cities can show such remarkable proof of newspaper results. During 1923, The Detroit News with 29,067,710 lines of advertising was surpassed only by one newspaper in all America in total advertising. In display advertising, The Detroit News was FIRST. As compared with the other two local newspapers, The Detroit News printed more advertising lineage than these papers combined.

In view of these facts, advertisers seeking a profitable field can not afford to overlook Detroit. Those who have already tried Detroit and The News have found it an unbeatable combination.

HOW SWOPE MADE GOTHAM A "CONVENTION CITY"

Whirlwind Executive Editor of New York World Tells Own Story to Editor & Publisher of Beating Down Wall Street Bogey and Tammany Curse—Gives His Newspaper Philosophy

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"I'D rather put this over, than anything else I ever did. They think I can't do it."

So exclaimed Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York World, during that dramatic period in Washington last January when New York outbid San Francisco, Chicago and St. Louis as the site for the Democratic National Convention.

Swope wanted the Democrats to come to the largest city in the United States, the world's financial center. He wanted, in the face of gigantic opposition, to see New York again "readmitted into the union," made eligible once more as a national convention city, after 56 years of exclusion.

The gavel will resound at the opening of the Democratic gathering in Madison Square Garden, June 24. A whirlwind newspaper man did it—Herbert Bayard Swope. To this Ralph Pulitzer, editor of the World and one of its owners, will agree, together with Frank Munsey, Joseph P. Day, Judge Morgan J. O'Brien, James W. Gerard, Stanley Quinn, Will H. Hays and other leaders who joined, at Swope's request, the campaign to make New York a convention city.

This week the writer asked Mr. Swope how were the Democrats persuaded to come to this city.

"At first it was largely a laboratory experiment," he replied, giving for the first time his own fiery story in answer to the question. "When we found fear of New York more apparent than real, we gave it all we had, that was all.

"What was wrong with New York, I wondered. Were we flying a pest flag? Did we all have the small-pox?

"Tammany is not as bad as it has been frequently painted. The World had often fought Mr. Murphy and would fight him again. New York was not supplicating for the convention. We were demanding readmission to the union as a right.

"Politicians really wanted to come to New York, but they feared New York's Wall Street and Tammany.

"The curse, I honestly believe, was taken off by the World. People trusted our newspaper in gratifying fashion. We consecrated the case."

When Swope talked, energy lived. His words in argument cut high and true, although they poured from lips at machine gun speed. Without attempting detailed description, two features stand out as essentially Swope's, his forehead and his chin. The high, expansive forehead is Swope, the thinker; the chin is Swope, determined man of action.

Two of Swope's associates were conversing with him when I called this week—Walter Lippmann, chief editorial writer, and Arthur Krock, assistant to Mr. Pulitzer, the editor. The latter remained a few moments. The purpose of the call was explained. Mr. Swope repeated my question to Krock.

"How was the Democratic convention brought to New York?"

Addressing the writer, Krock declared:

"First, Mr. Swope thought about it.

"Second, he organized it.

"Third, he publicized it.

"Fourth, he went and got it.

"And now he is arranging it."

"While we believed in the excellence of the plan, we did not necessarily at first believe in its efficacy," Swope now took up the conversation.

"As feelers we sent out wires to nationally prominent men and made requests locally. This was in May, 1923.

"I must admit many persons at first didn't believe it actually could be done. But what we wanted was a cross-section of public opinion, which would be as nearly accurate as possible.

"For instance, we printed Mr. Hearst's statement, which was opposed to New York as a convention city.

Herbert Bayard Swope—He Put It Over

"When we had obtained this cross-section, the World began distributing pamphlets, presenting our case.

"I gave a lunch at the Biltmore Hotel, inviting Frank Munsey, Morgan J. O'Brien, A. C. Pearson, George Edgar Smith, "Tex" Rickard, Joseph P. Day, and others. We wanted to make it non-partisan. Witness Mr. Munsey.

"Yes, it was quite personal at first," Swope admitted. "The Merchants Association was dubious. I finally persuaded Stanley Quinn to become assistant chairman of the executive committee. Then I got Joseph Day to become general chairman.

"In the early days, there were some amusing disclosures. Some of the biggest men in the city, the Wall Street leaders, such as Thomas W. Lamont, could only be persutaded to lend their support as a civic gesture. We had to appeal to their pride of city. Many, we knew, were lending their names more for the publicity it brought them than any strong belief that New York could be made a convention city.

"The newspapers gave their support, but it was no easy matter raising money," Swope confessed. "Finally we got together $150,000. The newspapers were the largest single trade unit contributing, gifts being received from the World, Times, American, Tribune, News and Sun."

In January of this year came the famous trip to Washington. "Swope's wild goose chase," it was called.

The evening before the National Committee met, the New York delegation had dinner at the Hotel Shoreham. At Swope's elbow were Charles Michelson, Charles S. Hand and John J. Leary, three of the World's correspondents.

Swope would turn to one or another of these correspondents every few minutes.

"Call New Hampshire," he would say, meaning the New Hampshire committee men. "Find out how they are going to vote." One of the correspondents would rush to his bidding. Often he would return with an unfavorable report. Arguing and cajoling, Swope was active among the delegates until the small hours of the morning.

The Democratic National Committee heard the bids next day and then adjourned for lunch. Manhattan had bid its $150,000 raised by Swope in New York, while San Francisco had offered $200,000. During lunch Swope conferred with "Tex" Rickard, and when the committee reassembled Judge O'Brien was able to say New York was prepared to increase its offer by $55,000 making the cash offer $205,000.

The committee took three roll calls. On the third ballot New York was chosen with 57 votes out of 103.

"Speech, Swope! Speech!" somebody called.

"This isn't the last time the Democratic convention is coming to New York," Swope rose and said. "You're going to like New York so well that the convention will come to New York from now on—every four years."

Swope had gone to Washington and obtained the convention. From January to the present date, he has been among the most active in making the arrangements.

"He is a horse for work," is the homely description of him given the writer by a member of the World staff. Often he is at work in his office these days until 4.30 a. m. New York has never known a reporter with more contacts than Swope. They are among the highest and the lowest, the best and the worst of the whole great city. In Wall Street as on the race tracks, among clergymen as among lawyers, with bankers as with politicians, in the theaters and the studios, in the criminal courts as in the offices of book publishers, among college presidents and prize fighters, he is known fearfully and affectionately.

Of him, William Preston Beazell, assistant managing editor of the World, has said:

"He is a living refutation of the belief that the days of 'personal journalism' are past. He has put his impress as deeply on the World as did Dana on the Sun, the elder Bennett on the Herald, Raymond on the Times, or Greeley on the Tribune."

Is it any wonder, when a man like Swope enters so intimately into the life of his city, that around him should grow up all kinds of discussion in New York newspaper circles.

"Too much Swope on the New York World," the writer has been told by an opposition newspaper man.

Because of such discussion, Swope's philosophy of newspapering becomes the more interesting. I asked him his views and ideas.

"The constituent elements of a newspaper," he began, "are interest, importance, truth, and timeliness. Timeliness is scarcely a full factor.

"News, in fact, is anything of interest. We all over-fetishize the yesterdays in our newspapers.

"Newspapers of the United States are definitely improving and improving quickly. They are improving because they are establishing a surer sense of values, and because they are preserving a surer contact between themselves and life.

"A newspaper is not a creator; it is a recorder. Newspapers should consist of the chronicle of the social body in which we live.

"Therefore, crime should not be barred. The proper representation of crime, in fact, is vitally necessary, although there should be no undue sensationalism—sensationalism that goes into faking. As long as a crime story is true, it should be printed.

"Newspapers of today have more political influence than ever before. This influence does not now come from the expressions of editorial opinion, but through the news columns, which have become instructors of public intelligence. No good newspaper nowadays excludes big news from its columns. Both sides of every question are given and the public left to judge."

Swope disavows the theory that he has impressed his own personality deeply on the World.

"Our newspaper," he declared, "is the product of collective intelligence. Everyone participates from reporter up. The reporter is by far the most important cog, because what the reporter gets and how he presents it is what counts."

The World's executive editor, one is told, never issues instructions. He makes suggestions, and if his suggestions can be kicked aside, no one is better pleased than himself.

"I believe in the widest sort of liberty for reporters as long as it does not become license," he told the writer. "No man's methods are ever questioned here, as long as they are honest.

"Newspaper writers should be limited only by truth, good taste, and a decent regard for the law of libel. I believe in encouraging individualism. I only want to know why a man does what he does."

To conclude the interview, I asked Swope his ideal of a newspaper. His answer was prompt and paradoxical.

"My ideal newspaper," he said, "is one with which I would never be dissatisfied. And as soon as you've made a newspaper which does not dissatisfy you, you have made a bad newspaper. The element of divine discontent must always be in a really good newspaper.

"The most successful way of being an unsuccessful journalist," he added, "is to try to please everyone."

To Issue a McAdoo Daily

The Progressive Democrat, a daily 8-page, tabloid size newspaper, will be published at the convention by the backers of the candidacy of William G. McAdoo, it has been announced. The paper will furnish convention news to delegates and visitors without regard to their political views. It will appear at 10 o'clock each morning, beginning Monday next. The Progressive Democrat will be in charge of Phil Painter of Birmingham, editor and publisher of the Advance, a weekly publication, which has contributed to McAdoo's candidacy in the South.

"Three Thousand Square Miles of Prosperity"

Within sixty minutes ride of the famous Chicago "loop" there are more than 3,500,000 prosperous buyers.

This is the world's richest, most compact market, reached and influenced by a single medium.

With its circulation of 400,000—approximately 1,200,000 readers daily—The Chicago Daily News thoroughly saturates this market and influences the buying decisions of the great majority of its consumers.

Intelligent, up-to-the-minute, impartial trade surveys, made by The Chicago Daily News Merchandising Service, give the prospective seller a business-like, comprehensive "close-up" of the market that enables him to proceed with the minimum of effort and the maximum of result. The Chicago Daily News Merchandising Service routes and directs sales forces, establishes cooperation with dealers, and, if requested will employ and supervise sales forces. It does not sell for the advertiser—it creates dealer acceptance for him, as Daily News advertising creates consumer acceptance for the dealers.

One opulent, compact market—one centralized campaign—one sufficient and efficient medium—

W. R. HEARST, JR., A FLYBOY IN PLANT OF FATHER'S LATEST — N. Y. MIRROR

Tabloid Expected to Appear Next Week as Evening Daily with Walter Howie as Editor and E. M. Alexander, Publisher —Young Hearst Carries Union Card

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST will start publication of an evening tabloid newspaper in New York City next week, Arthur Brisbane has informed EDITOR AND PUBLISHER. It will be called the New York Mirror.

Mr. Brisbane professed uncertainty as to date and detailed plans.

Walter Howie will be editor of the new tabloid, and E. M. Alexander, publisher, Mr. Brisbane said. Attempts to get in touch with these men before EDITOR AND PUBLISHER went to press failed.

One EDITOR AND PUBLISHER informant set the date for the first appearance of the Mirror for Tuesday, June 24, the opening day of the National Democratic Convention at Madison Square Garden.

Rumors that the Hearst organization planned to enter the tabloid field in New York had been circulated for some time. In fact for two years at intervals the report was circulated that such a move was contemplated.

Mr Hearst, in his auxiliary plant at 55 Frankfort street has long had sufficient equipment to start a tabloid.

During the last week the rumors gathered strength when it was seen that editorial room equipment was being installed in the floor over this auxiliary plant, and when it was learned that negotiations were being made to the Mail and Newspaper Deliverers' Union.

John R. Hastings, managing editor of the New York Journal, is assisting Howie in gathering together a staff for the Mirror.

Howie, known to many as "Whirlwind Howie," left the Chicago Tribune to become connected with the Hearst organization. For a while he was with the Chicago Herald-Examiner. Then be became managing editor of the Boston Amercian.

William R. Hearst, Jr., to Work as Pressman On New York Mirror

"He's a regular fellow."

Jack Joyce, a pressman, said that. Jack was referring to William Randolph Hearst, Jr., 17-year old son of the publisher, who for the past few days has been doffing silk shirt and tailored suit to don overalls and work as fly boy in one of his father's New York press rooms —the one from which the new tabloid will be published.

As the rules require, he carries a union card in his pocket.

W. R., Jr., an unusually tall boy for his age, isn't permitted to talk for publication. He is under the care of H. M. Roberts, business manager of the New York American, during these working days of his.

"He's having a good time," vouchsafed Mr. Roberts. "But I don't want him to make any statement for publication."

The Journal on June 13 carried an editorial on it under the caption "When Men are Really Working—They Look Pretty Much Alike, Rich or Poor." The editorial was illustrated with the picture used on this page.

So EDITOR AND PUBLISHER went down to 55 Frankfort street, where the youngster had been working and talked it over with his fellow printers. The working day was over. William Junior had washed grime away and had changed overalls for a smart suit.

He had been driven to his Riverside Drive home by his younger brother, John, who had remarked that he had "come to collect Bill."

Jesse Rosenthal, William Smart, John Cook, Richard Sheehan, John Collins, and Jack Joyce, printers all, were consulted.

"I wouldn't do what he's doing, if I had his money, you can bet on that," they agreed in chorus.

"But he's a good sort of guy—a hard worker, too. He says he likes it fine And perhaps he does. Maybe it's a good change for him that's used to different sort of stuff.

"He hops about lively enough. Does all he's told. And more, too."

Of course young William has not exactly the same future ahead as Rosenthal, Smart, Cook, Sheehan and the rest, even though he is sharing their present for a while. He may keep the flyboy job through the summer as he plans now. Then he may give it up, even before this story is printed.

"I don't think he'll stick it out long," one printer said.

"He says he wants to learn the business from the ground up. Some day he'll be running the old man's papers, and he'll want to know what the press room job is like.

"Well, he's learning that. He isn't shown any favoritism. And it's no easy job and not enough pay."

A fly boy's pay varies. Size of the envelope handed over by the cashier depends upon the amount of overtime turned in. It may average about $20 a week.

"He works from eight o'clock in the morning until 4," the writer was told. "Same as the rest of us guys."

The press room where he has been working is the one used to print the tabloid section at one time issued with the New York American.

It houses two sextuple Hoe tabloid presses. These presses are now being tested out preparatory to their use in publication of Mr. Hearst's new evening tabloid newspaper, the New York Mirror. The room is not over large. One perspired easily just watching others work.

"When men really work or fight, they look much alike, if they are really working and fighting, not making believe," the editorial in the New York Journal on young Hearst declared.

"William R. Hearst, unusually tall for his age, is several years younger than the average pressroom worker.

"W. R. Hearst, who went to the public school when he was a boy, and took charge of the San Francisco Examiner, as owner, the moment he left college, believes that boys should work.

"That's why the two oldest of his five sons are now working in his newspaper plant. William, whom you see in this picture, will go back to his studies in the Fall.

"He thinks that working in the pressroom is very exciting, very good fun. Any kind of hard work is good fun for the right kind of boy.

"From the workmen's point of view it is an excellent thing for young William Randolph Hearst to have this season of work. He will realize, by actual experience, the truth of the statement made by his father, long ago, before a Congressional committee, that eight hours of hard work is as much as any man should be asked to do, and that the employer that .t make an eight-hour day pay is not fit to employ American labor."

WM R. HEARST, JR.

Central figure in the group of three, sitting on the lower steps leading to a W. R. Hearst press room in New York, is W. R. Hearst, Jr., seventeen-year-old son of the publisher, who is spending his summer in the sweltering heat as flyboy—at $20 a week. Sufficient price to buy him a silk shirt for a debutante party at the Ritz. He says, "I'm having a fine time." His younger brother, John, comes to "collect him" each night in a limousine. His older brother, George, tries his hand in the business office of the New York American.

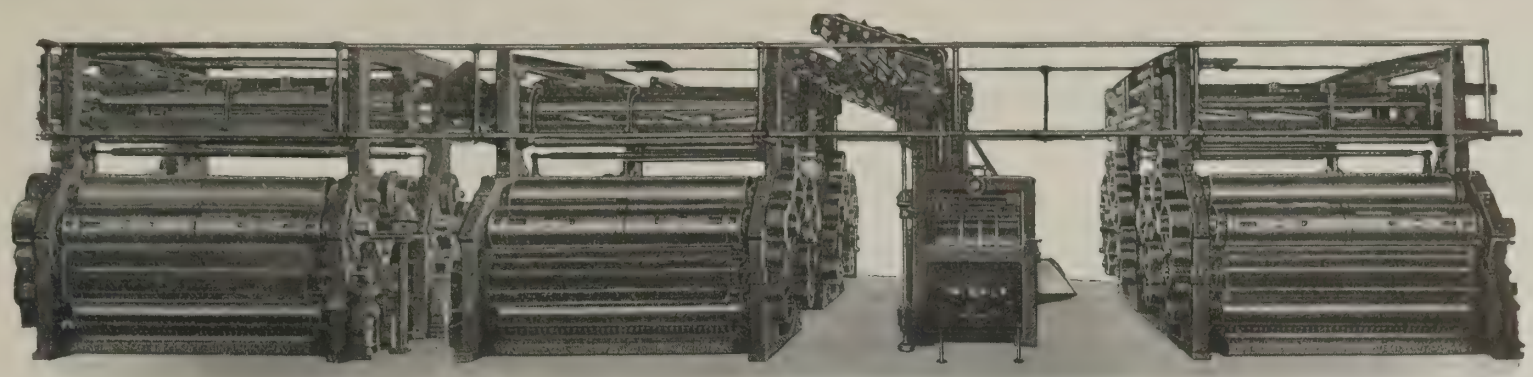
GROZIER WILLS BOSTON POST TO SON

Late Publisher Provides for Control to Be Kept in Family—Son Bequeathed 2010 Shares in Company

Edwin Atkins Grozier, late editor and publisher of the Boston Post, in his will dated July 6, 1920, and filed June 14, in the Probate Court for the County of Middlesex, State of Massachusetts, bequeathed to his son, Richard Grozier, who succeeded him as editor and publisher of the Post, 2,010 shares of stock in the Post Publishing Company, a controlling interest. Mr. Grozier, the younger, had for several years been a substantial holder of Post Publishing Company shares.

RICHARD GROZIER

In passing over control of the newspaper to which he gave the best years of his life, Mr. Grozier uses these words in his will. "I urge my son, in whose integrity and ability I have full confidence, to conduct the Boston Post, published by said corporation, not merely as a money-making enterprise but primarily and zealously in the interests of the people of Boston and New England."



Richard Grozier is directed to pay to his mother, Mrs. Alice G. Grozier, one-half of the dividends received by him from the Post Publishing Company during her lifetime, and subsequently to pay to his sister, Mrs. Helen Grozier Farley, one-third of such dividends during her lifetime. Mrs. Grozier and Mrs. Farley receive the residue of the estate after the payment of certain specific bequests, and this residue includes additional shares of Post Publishing stock.

Mr. Grozier made it plain in his will that he desires the Post to continue in the possession of the Grozier family. The will directs that any legatee receiving shares of Post Publishing Company stock and desiring to sell the same, or any portion of it, must first offer the stock for sale to other holders in the family at a price 10 per cent lower than the sum offered them for the stock. The other stockholders in the family are to have 6 months in which to accept and pay for the stock, and they may purchase proportionately to the number of shares already held. In case one or more do not desire to purchase, the remaining bidders or holders have the right to procure shares not so bought. As a further precaution against this Post Publishing Company stock being transferred outside the family, the will provides that in case any stock is sold in violation of this condition, the other holders in the family may recover from the vendor the price paid.

Richard Grozier, who thus inherits control of the Post Publishing Company, has been active in the management of the Post for several years. He is 38 years old, was graduated from Harvard in 1909, and during the last 15 years has worked in all departments of the paper. Before his father's death, he acted as assistant editor and publisher. His name now replaces that of the elder Grozier at the masthead.

Widow and son are named as executors, and exempted from giving bonds. The amount of the estate is not indicated. Among the specific bequests made is one of $25,000 to William A. Grozier, of Melrose, business manager of the Post, made, in the words to the testator, to "my dear brother, William A. Grozier, who has devoted his entire life to my interests with unswerving fidelity." Bequests to other relatives total $30,000.

A political manager is a man who wonders how many wets would vote that way.—Baltimore Sun.

YUCATAN DAILY'S PLANT DESTROYED BY MASKED MOB

La Revista Burned to Ground After Savage Attack, Director Carlos R. Menendez Informs Editor & Publisher—Motive Unknown

Without warning or any known reason, an armed mob entered and destroyed the fine offices and plant of La Revista of Yucatan, completing the vandalism by setting fire to the ruins, on the night of May 26, according to mail advices from Merida, reaching EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week, from Carlos R. Menendez, director of the newspaper, one of the most influential and prosperous daily publications in Latin America.

Only the crumbling ruins of La Revista's $100,000 plant when the people of Merida gathered to view the results of the masked band's raid.

The story of the assault, which is without precedent in Yucatan, is told by Mr. Menendez, in the following language:

"Last night, a few minutes before one o'clock, the employees in charge of our plant were preparing the issue which should have circulated this morning, when suddenly and without any cause, (La Revista De Yucatan has been developing a patriotic work of peace, with irreproachable impartiality), a mob of more than 50 men, some disguised, but all armed with revolvers, knives, hatchets and sticks, dashed through the entrance door, like a devastating torrent, and scattered along all the departments, workshops and offices, throwing themselves, as cannibals, over their prey.

"They made firewood of the valuable department of Graphic Arts, a building that gave honor to Yucatan. They did the same thing with the desks, book-cases and files, in the direction, editorial and administrative halls. After chopping with mallets and hatchets the rotary printing press, they soaked it with petroleum and fired it. They did the same thing in other departments, especially in the linotype room. The whole building was soon ablaze.

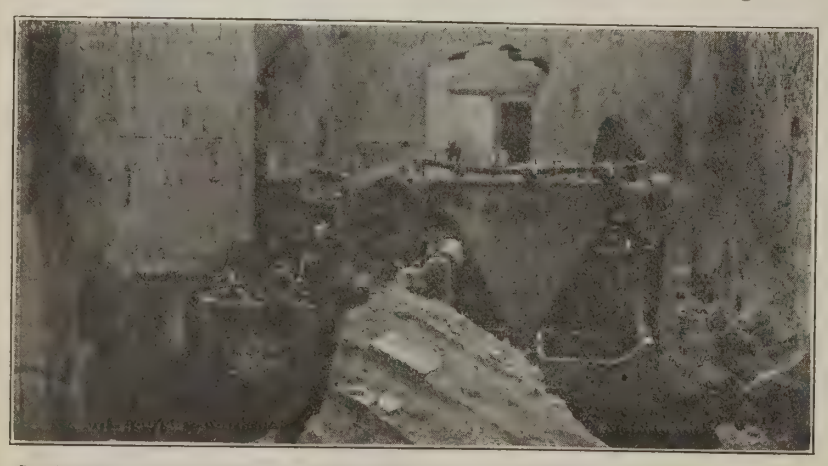
"Two young men, Charles A. Menendez, my son, and Silverio Campo, attempting to go out, were shot and struck with the butts of pistols. My son received a wound in an arm and another in the head. Mr. Camps was wounded in the head.

"Nobody disturbed the assailants during the performance of their crime. When finished, they calmly retreated. And mockery! They arrested our night watchman and locked him up for a while.

"After an hour the offices and workshops had disappeared.

"La Revista De Yucatan has a splendid day and night service, and besides, we believed ourselves to be under the protection of a cultured and progressive Government and amid a civilized society. We thought needless to give large sums of money to the insurance companies, and nothing was insured.

"After devoting our energies and our patriotism to the service of society and our country, we have lost, once more, in a few hours, the fruit of our hard and honest work.



"Who were the instigators of this outrageous act? Public opinion with its innate clairvoyance points to them with a firm finger and their names quiver in everybody's lips, but we are not yet in a position to throw those names to public ignominy nor to the tribunals of justice.

"We have reported the facts to the competent authorities.

"We have little hope of obtaining complete justice. We are accustomed to the struggle. We yet have energies. If the unthinking mobs do not kill us we shall shortly return to the fight. We thank our friends for the manifestation of sympathy."

Mr. Menendez is a member of the Press Congress of the world, a zealous advocate of free press and for a quarter of a century has diligently worked to upbuild his Yucatan newspapers.

His son is reported recovering.

Great masses of stone and masonry, torn by fire from the walls, reduced the Duplex press to twisted scrap. A gasoline can, left behind by the vandals, can be seen at the left centre of the press.

The following letter has been received by members of the Press Congress of the World, in New York:

"MERIDA YUCATAN, Mex.,
"May 31, 1924.

"Press Congress of the World,
"New York City.

"My Dear Sirs and Colleagues: As a member of your honorable Association, I have the honor and at the same time the mortification and shame of sending you a fly-sheet or informative bulletin which I published on May 27, giving an account of the savage outrage, unbecoming even of the wildest cave men, against the offices, workshops, etc., of La Revista de Yucatan. The product of several years of honest work was consumed in a few hours. The loss amounted to $200,000, Mexican money.

"The Government's immense responsibility for this crime, you may assay when reading the details of the assault. Civilization has been dragged through the mire in this unhappy State. The police not only refused their aid against the assailants, but prevented, with the force of arms, the neighbors and the mass of people from going in quest of help.

"When one of my sons, who was sleeping in the building, tried to let me know what was happening, he was barbarously wounded. Despite the profound public indignation and the unanimous protest against this brutal assault, the judicial authorities have made, up to this date, no inquiries nor taken any measures for the prosecution of the criminals, although Public Opinion points sternly towards the prominent instigators.

"As a journalist, as a civilized man, and as a member of the Press Congress of the World, I, the victim, denounce to the Press Congress of the World, this cowardly and stupid crime, which would disgrace Justice, Liberty, Honor and Civilization. I solicit the aid of the Press Congress of the World, to prevent this crime being left unpunished; to oblige the Government to repair the damages caused, and that all the newspapers, members of that Association, make an energetic protest and publish to the world how the rights of civilization are respected in a country ruled by a government which calls itself republican, cultured, and also socialist.

"I do not doubt that my request will have your attention, so I heartily thank you and the Association, and remain,

"Very cordially,
"CARLOS R. MENENDEZ,
"Director of the La Revista de Yucatan."

Three Linotypes, one of which appears to be a recent model, were in the path of the flames and falling walls and were practically ruined.

NEW PITTSBURGH DAILY TO APPEAR SOON

Dispatch, Backed by Local Group, Will Begin Publishing in Mid-August—Grise President, Faulkner Managing Editor

Pittsburgh's new daily newspaper, the Pittsburgh Dispatch, backed by a group of which George P. Grise is president, will begin publishing the middle of August, according to a statement given EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week.

The daily will be 16 pages, 8 columns, and will carry International News Service, Cosmopolitan Service, and a special sport wire. All equipment has been contracted for, including 12 Linographs and a Duplex press. Installation will begin soon.

A circulation of 17,000 is claimed by President Grise, based on subscriptions and contracts with news dealers.

The company has leased with option to buy the 4-story Speer Building, 118 Sixth street, in the lower side of the downtown district. This building now houses the offices of the promoters. Capitalization of the daily is $3,500,000.

Leonard Faulkner, formerly of the New York Herald, will be managing editor of the Dispatch. A complete staff for both editorial and business departments has been obtained, according to Mr. Grise, but individual names will not be announced until a later date. Twenty-two reporters will be employed, he said.

Officers of the Dispatch Company are: George P. Grise, Avalanon, Pa., president; Anna Core Grise, vice-president; A. M. Winner, secretary; John A. Hooper, advertising manager; R. F. Erhler and J. C. Cochran, in charge of circulation.

Speak to the United States Through

The New York Times

THE New York Times is published in the greatest home market of the world, and in the national market place of the United States. It is America's foremost newspaper and excels as an advertising medium.

In the New York Metropolitan District, with the most concentrated population area in the United States, The New York Times is read by the largest group of intelligent, discriminating and responsive persons. Their purchasing good will is the most desirable asset an advertiser can obtain. More than 9,000,000 people live in the Metropolitan District and their annual income is in excess of $8,000,000,000.

The circulation of the Sunday edition of The New York Times is in excess of 575,000 copies, of which 400,000 copies are distributed in the Metropolitan District and in the region within 150 miles of New York. While the circulation of The New York Times has its greatest concentration in and about New York City, it is read in every state of the United States and in every province of Canada—more than 8,000 cities, towns and villages.

The New York Times leads all other New York newspapers in the volume of advertising—24,101,226 agate lines published in 1923, or 6,730,388 lines more than the second newspaper.

The New York Times leads in country-wide advertising—5,624,358 lines published in 1923, or 2,202,906 lines more than the second newspaper. More than 200 country-wide advertisers used The Times exclusively among New York morning newspapers in 1923.

The New York Times leads every newspaper in the world in financial advertising, publishing 2,371,438 lines in 1923 in this classification, 1,336,540 lines more than the second New York newspaper.

In five months of this year the advertising leadership of The New York Times over all New York newspapers was maintained in about the same ratio.

The advertising columns of The New York Times are subject to as careful a censorship as its news columns. Advertisements that are not clean or reputable, regarded as misleading or questionable, are rejected.

HEARST CALLS HALT ON WASHINGTON HERALD'S RESORT PROJECT

Real Estate Subscription Tie-up Launched by Snodgrass Disapproved and Latter Resigns—Will Carry Idea Through, He States

By SAM BELL
(Washington Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST'S antipathy for real estate enterprises as circulation or business getters for his newspapers, has been demonstrated again in Washington by his repudiation of the "Herald Harbor" project, inaugurated last month by Rhey T. Snodgrass, then publisher of the Washington Herald, the Hearst morning paper in the capital. "Herald Harbor" is a bungalow colony near Washington in which lots were sold on subscription to the Herald.

As the result of Mr. Hearst's action in washing his hands of the enterprise, Mr. Snodgrass has severed his connection with the newspaper and will carry out the project in the manner it had been advertised in the Herald, with the exception of the subscription stipulation of the original plan.

Mr. Hearst, convinced that he is without legal obligation in the matter, because the project was launched without his knowledge or authority, nevertheless has announced he "stands ready to reimburse purchasers on or before June 22, for any payment made by them upon reliance that the Herald was backing the enterprise, and will if they desire relieve them of the subscription to the Herald." The announcement, made on the editorial page of the Herald, June 13, asserted that "it has long been the policy of the Hearst organization to keep its newspapers free from real estate enterprises of every kind, no matter how meritorious they might be."

The development of the "Herald Harbor" enterprise and its subsequent repudition by Mr. Hearst, accompanied by the resignation of Mr. Snodgrass and W. C. Shelton, circulation manager of the Hearst organization in Washington, has caused no little comment. Mr. Shelton more recently severed all connection with the project and has returned to the Herald as head of the circulation department. A few subscribers to the Herald on the basis of the "Herald Harbor" project have withdrawn their subscription but on the whole persons purchasing lots under the subscription stipulation appear to have been satisfied with their bargain. Mr. Snodgrass, who came to Washington several months ago from the Hearst papers in Milwaukee to take charge of the Herald as publisher, relieving Logan Payne of double duty with the Times and Herald, tells of affairs and his part in it substantially as follows:

With his arrival in Washington, Mr. Snodgrass said he looked around to determine the chief needs of Washington and how the Herald might operate to secure those needs for the city and at the same time increase its circulation. The lack of a real summer resort near the city, he found, was noticeable, and many Washington people backed him up in that judgment. When a project of developing a bungalow colony on the banks of the Severn River, 10 miles up from Annapolis and within commuting distance of Washington, was broached, Mr. Snodgrass was impressed and inspection of the 400 acres of land there that could be purchased disclosed what he considered an ideal site for such project.

Snodgrass frankly acknowledged that he went ahead on his own responsibility and was amazed at the results of his first announcement as a circulation getter for the Herald. Lots were sold for from $25 to $250 apiece, dependent upon the location. A year's subscription to the Herald (week days) entitled the subscriber to purchase one lot, and a subscription to the Sunday Herald entitled the subscriber to purchase another lot. If 3 or 4 lots was desired they could be obtained by getting friends to subscribe, but no more than one individual or family was permitted to buy more than 4 lots.

The success of the first few days of the sale, it was announced on May 20, prompted Mr. Snodgrass to go to New York in an effort to get from the Hearst organization an appropriation of $25,000 to build a boulevard into the property from the station of the suburban railroad ation by Mr. Hearst, accompanied by the that operates from Washington to Annapolis and Baltimore.

This was the first time Mr. Hearst had heard of the project. The council of his executives that followed decided that it could not go on. Snodgrass said he expostulated and demonstrated how sound the proposal was and how enthusiastically the people of Washington had responded.

"Mr. Hearst and his advisers were adamant," said Snodgrass, "so there was nothing more for me to do but leave the organization and continue the project. There is no hard feeling in the matter. It has been worked out satisfactorily. The name of the bungalow colony will by Herald Harbor; the Herald is carrying our advertisements and the project will be carried out successfully although divorced from the newspaper and without a subscription requirement."

PRINTERS ELECT LYNCH

Made President of International Typographical Union Succeeding Howard

James M. Lynch of Syracuse won a majority of 2,629 votes out of approximately 56,000 votes cast in the race for president of the International Typographical Union, according to a count made public in Indianapolis, June 16. He succeeds Charles P. Howard of Detroit.

Lynch, who was president of the organization from 1900 to 1913, swept the entire "administration" ticket into office with him. Other officers elected and their majorities, according to the unofficial count, are:

Seth Brown, Los Angeles, defeated George F. Beach, New York, for first vice president by 1,658; Austin Hewson, New York, defeated William R. Trotter, Vancouver, B. C., for second vice president by 3,630 and J. W. Hays, Minneapolis, was re-elected secretary-treasurer over William A. Aldrich, Chicago, by 5,996.

Other officers elected included:

Trustees for the Union Printers' Home — Walter E. Ames, Milwaukee; Malcomb A. Knock, Boston; George P. Nichols, Baltimore; E. D. Ballentine, Newark, N. J.

American Federation of Labor Delegates—Frank Morrison, Chicago; Max S. Hayes, Cleveland; T. W. McCullough, Omaha; John C. Harding, Chicago, and William Young, Philadelphia.

Union Printers' Home—Joe M. Johnson, Washington.

Auditor—Fred Barker, Spokane Falls, Washington.

Delegates to Trades and Labor Congress of Canada—George W. Howard, Winnipeg, Man.

Lorimer and Woollcott Receive Degrees

George Horace Lorimer, editor of the Saturday Evening Post, and Alexander Woollcott, dramatic critic of the New York Sun, were honored by different universities this week, receiving honorary LL. D. and M. A. degrees respectively. The recognition awarded Lorimer was by Colgate University, Hamilton, N. Y. It is his second this year. McGill University, Montreal, Can., honored him similarly recently. Woollcott was granted his degree by Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y. He was graduated from there with the class of '09.

NOT quite cricket, perhaps, to vaunt one's position, but when it signifies achievement that can be helpful to one's friends, there is at least a bit of justification.

So we shall just show you a few figures that should be useful in determining the Capital City medium for your sales message—on that biggest advertising day of the week—Sunday:—

Sunday Circulation

THE WASHINGTON HERALD

122,877

2nd Newspaper, 100,762

3rd Newspaper, 68,711

Not bad, eh, in a city of something less than 400,000 souls? We think these comparative figures (from the current A. B. C.'s) give a deeper insight into the Washington newspaper situation than any tabulated braggadocio about "First" in this classification and "First" in that—

Our claims are confined to the fact that THE WASHINGTON HERALD has the one really worth-while "FIRST" for any newspaper and every advertiser—"FIRST" in the estimation of good old Vox Populi!

CHAPTER ELEVEN

Story of Mr. Bennett's Marriage and Birth of His Son, James Gordon Bennett, Jr.—Hot Newspaper Warfare Continues

IN defence of his private life, Mr. Bennett, in 1838, said:

"My whole private life has been one of virtue, integrity and honorable effort. Dissipation, extravagance and fashionable follies never had any charms for me." He was in no sense a "ladies' man," though treating the fair sex with chivalric regard for their aims and feelings, and in fact he had no time to enter New York society. So it was an unsolicited piece of good fortune that first brought him into contact with his future wife, Miss Henrietta Agnes Crean.

On March 23, 1839, Mr. Atree married a very pretty and amiable girl, the daughter of a woman who kept a small confectionery store. Miss Crean, who was a music teacher, had this young lady among her pupils, and she and her mother, who kept a dry goods store in William street, were invited to the wedding reception. Of course, Mr. Bennett was Atree's honored guest at the reception, and there first met Miss Crean. It was apparently a case of love at first sight.

The Herald the following morning contained a long report of the wedding and subsequent festivities, which follows in part:

"This young lady, (Mr. Atree's bride) whose existence was unknown among the beau monde till this blessed week, by connecting herself in marriage with an editor, at one bound, as it were, takes her station among the elite; issues her cards of invitation pro forma, and gives a soiree which for intellectuality, splendor, refined pleasure and philosophical enjoyment, it would be difficult to equal and impossible to surpass."

Of Miss Crean, Mr. Bennett wrote in the loftiest vein of compliment, as follows:

"The young lady of the distinguished Irish family of Crean (recently arrived from Dublin), afforded a fine specimen of the beauty and talent to be met with among the higher order of her sex in Ireland. She was the belle of the evening. She is descended from one of the most ancient families in Ireland—a family that has furnished history with deeds of heroism long before the subjugation of the bloody Anglo-Normans."

His courtship proceeded with due deliberation, so that he and his prospective bride had become thoroughly well acquainted with one another prior to his famous editorial announcing his coming marriage, which appeared on June 1, 1840, and which is as follows:

TO THE READERS OF THE HERALD.
Declaration Of Love—Caught At Last—Going To Be Married—New Movement In Civilization.

"I am going to be married in a few days. The weather is so beautiful—times are getting so good—the prospects of political and moral reform so auspicious, that I cannot resist the divine instinct of honest nature any longer—so I am going to be married to one of the most splendid women in intellect, in heart, in soul, in property, in person, in manners, that I have yet seen in the course of my interesting pilgrimage through human life.

"I cannot stop in my career. I must fulfill the awful destiny which the Almighty Father has written in broad letters of life against the wall of Heaven. I must give the world a pattern of happy wedded life.

"In a few days I shall be married according to the holy rites of the most holy Christian church, to one of the most remarkable, accomplished and beautiful young women of the age. She possesses a fortune. She has no Stonington shares or Manhattan stock, but in purity and uprightness, she is worth a half million of pure coin. Happily, the patronage of the public to the Herald is nearly $25,000 per annum, almost equal to the President's salary. But property in the world's goods was never my object. Fame, public good, usefulness in my day and generation—the progress of true industry—these have been my dreams by night and my desire by day. In the new and holy condition into which I am about to enter, with the same reverential feelings as I would Heaven itself—I anticipate some signal changes in my feelings, in my views, in my purposes, in my pursuits. What they may be I know not; time alone can tell. My ardent desire has been through life to reach the highest order of human excellence by the shortest possible cut. Associated night and day, in sickness and in health, in war and in peace, with a woman of the highest order of excellence, must produce some curious results in my heart and feelings, and these results the future will develop in due time in the columns of the Herald.

"Meantime I return my heartfelt thanks for the enthusiastic patronage of the public, both of Europe and America. The holy estate of wedlock will only increase my desire to be still more useful. God Almighty bless you all.

"JAMES GORDON BENNETT."

The marriage notice is as follows:

"MARRIED.—On Saturday afternoon, the 6th inst., by the Rev. Dr. Power at St. Peter's Church in Barclay Street, James Gordon Bennett, the proprietor and editor of the New York Herald, to Henrietta Agnes Crean. What may be the effect of this event on the great newspaper contest now waging in New York, time alone can tell."

The above appeared at the head of the editorial column on June 8, 1840.

The novelty of an editor thus announcing his coming marriage at such great length, aroused much interest all over the United States, and the editorial was reproduced in whole or in part in the papers of every section.

Mr. Bennett was a generous provider; had the money to secure the best of everything for his bride, and installed her in a richly furnished house in Chambers Street, then a fashionable residential centre.

The honeymoon was passed in a trip to Niagara Falls, Mr. Bennett thus interestingly referring to one phase of it:

"There is music in the voice of Niagara Falls—there is melody and harmony of the most original kind. Sit down on one of the projecting rocks and listen to the many voices joined in a mighty chorus. Mrs. Bennett intends to compose a piece of music in imitation of the singular harmony of the waters." He then referred to the fact that she had written a popular piece of music, entitled "The Strawberry Waltz," the theme being based on the melodious voice of a girl selling strawberries from door to door.

On their return to New York City, Mr. Bennett and his bride became guests at the famous Astor House, until their mansion at 114 Chambers Street was made ready for occupancy. Disgraceful to say, their enemies secretly urged Mr. Charles Stetson, the urbane proprietor, to refuse to receive the editor and his bride, on the ground that their reputation had been reflected on. Mr. Stetson was highly indignant, as Mr. Bennett was a friend of his, and he privately informed the hostile publishers, that the editor of the Herald and his bride were welcomed as guests at the Astor House.

The Aurora, a weekly society paper thus pleasantly referred to Mrs. Bennett, not long after her marriage:

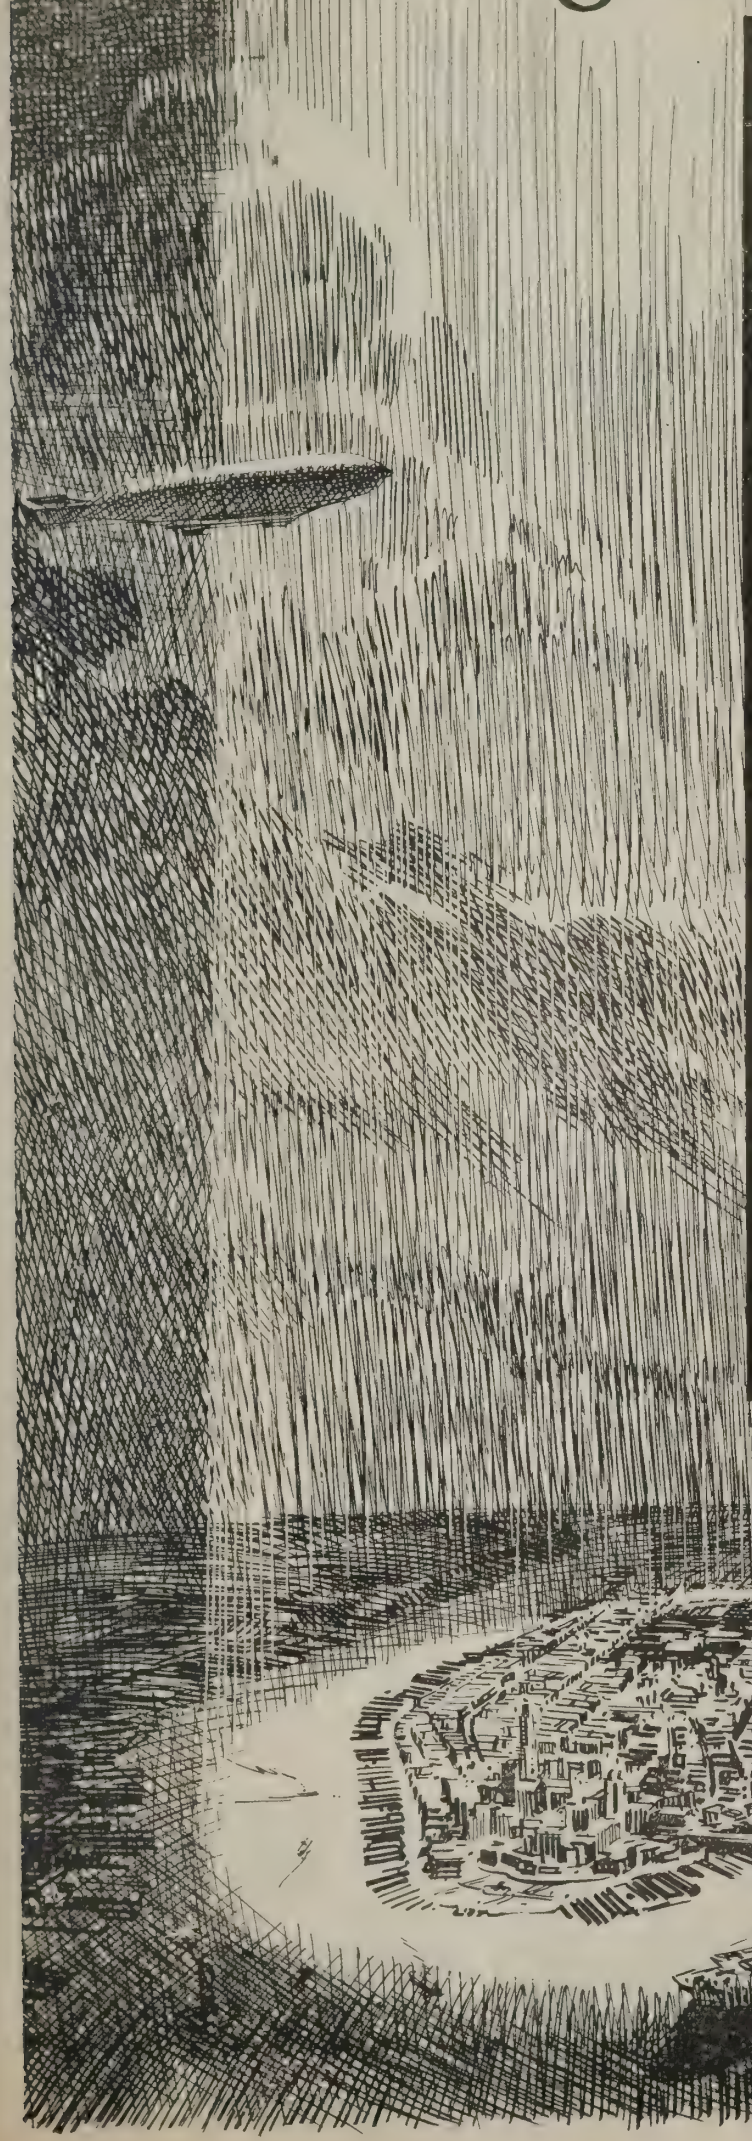
"The charming lady who now shares the powers and cash of the 'Napoleon of the press,' two years ago might have been seen in a neat little straw bonnet and a calico frock, walking around town and giving lessons to our democratic young misses in New York on the piano-forte. Now, see the reward of virtue. She has a house of her own, furnished with imperial magnificence; has a thousand dollar piano; rides in her carriage and instead of giving music lessons, is sung and played to by the most eminent vocalists and musicians, and also shares the honor and renown of the 'Napoleon of the press.'"

The So-Called Moral War

Mr. Bennett's enemies actively continued their attacks on him and the Herald, in a so-called "Moral War." Rival editors, chagrined and maddened by his phenomenal success, invented and printed all sorts of derogatory slanders upon him. One story, given with circumstantial detail, was that he had been a pedler in Glasgow, Scotland; to which he retorted:

"I am and have been a pedler, and part of my name is Gordon; this I admit. From my youth up I have been a pedler—not of tapes and laces, but of thoughts, feelings, lofty principles and great truths. I am now a wholesale dealer in the same line of business, and people generally believe I have quite a run, and what is better, no dread of suspension."

In their desperate efforts to malign him, his opponents used such abusive epithets as "uneducated wretch," "liar and poltroon," "vagabond who fled his country," etc. Serene and unperturbed, Mr. Bennett pursued the even tenor of his way, making money fast with his popular newspaper; his only weapon of defence being his vitriolic pen, which, metaphorically, scarred and seared his reckless traducers, while, when his arduous day's work was done, he could return to his home, welcomed to its peace and quietude by his affectionate, sympathetic wife.



The Herald Independent in Politics

In the fall of 1840, an excited Presidential campaign was being conducted, and Mr. Bennett, with characteristic independence and adhering to his oft repeated assertion, that the Herald was "non-partisan," on October 26, published a cartoon, entitled: "The Devil Let Loose in Wall Street." It showed his Satanic Majesty playing a game of ninepins with the office seekers and the officeholders, and was a "take-off" on the corrupt Locofoco and Whig candidate. A leading editorial accompanied it, entitled: "Awful State of the Country—Election Frauds Produced by the Banking System—A Revelation of Blood in Prospect." On the following day he thus referred to his political independence:

"Since the enlargement of the Herald about four weeks ago (new size of page, 21 by 30 inches), the business of this establishment has increased at a greater ratio than ever it did in the same period of time. Aggregate increase in five weeks, 5,000, giving us a total of 41,000 circulation. * * * Our advertising business has also increased in an equal proportion. The mutations, changes and excitements of party do not affect our progress or prosperity. We despise the politicians of both sides, and we believe every honest man in the country does the same. By their mutual affidavits they have proved themselves to be an arrant set of knaves, and we have too great a regard for the sanctity of an oath to disbelieve either of the cliques. The patronage which the public has so liberally extended to us, is the reward of enterprise and independence. Nor shall we ever disappoint them in these qualities hereafter."

The Herald with characteristic enterprise published on a large scale, the Official Map of New York City's election districts, 74 in number, and the northern boundary of which was at 40th Street! On November 5, the Herald gave full election returns, showing that General Harrison had defeated Martin Van Buren, "who has taken passage up Salt River."

The next day Mr. Bennett poked fun at Horace Greeley as follows:

"Master Horace Greeley, the great political noodle of the day, is very savage upon us, because we have exposed his pretensions in Pennsylvania election returns. The big brown-bread baby! Before he was out of his petticoats, we knew more of that subject than he could, if he were to eat a mountain of brown bread and drink a lake of fresh water dry. He says that several of our election returns are 'gross blunders.' To be sure they are. We gave them as such—they were Stevens' figures. We were not deceived ourself or deceived others. The Noodle!"

At intervals Mr. Bennett published sanitary and health advice for the benefit of the public, and on Nov. 17, 1840, thus addressed his women readers:

"Ladies, the cold weather is coming. Get yourselves thick shoes—warm clothing —and comfortable apartments. Don't sacrifice everything to fashion and small feet."

He was also publicly appreciative of palatable articles of food, as the following paragraph demonstrates:

"DOWNINGS, BROAD STREET.—This is one of the most remarkable places in New York. Downing himself is a remarkable man, and Mrs. Downing the most remarkable of all. This is not Major Jack Downing—it is Downing who deals in pickled oysters, and all kinds of oysters. Probably he supplies half of New York with oysters, prepared in all and every way. Try him."

Birth of James Gordon Bennett, Jr.

An event of great significance and importance to the senior Bennett, occurred on May 10, 1841, being the birth of a son and heir. It was officially chronicled in the form of a regulation birth notice, which appeared in the Herald on the following morning:

"Birth:—On Monday morning, 10th May, at his residence in Chambers Street, the lady of James Gordon Bennett, of a son."

The news of the auspicious event was received with great satisfaction by his many friends, and it was a common remark that "a young editor" had been born as the coming successor to his gifted father

The coming of a son and heir was a fresh incentive to Mr. Bennett to pursue his meteoric career, and he willingly accepted the title of the "Napoleon of the Press." Occasionally he referred to his "life of domestic bliss," and on June 23rd, 1842, writing from Saratoga Springs, he said:

"I am thus far on my way on a short tour for the benefit of the health, nerves, good spirits, and the rosy cheeks of 'the young editor,' who is improving every day and is highly delighted with his journey. On entering the fairy gardens of the United States Hotel, kept by the unrivalled Marvin, he held up his hand in utter astonishment, and exclaimed in his expressive vernacular—'hoo! hoo!—hoo! hoo!' which being translated means, 'This will do.'"

Continuance of Herald-Sun Hostilities

On Nov. 2, 1842, under the heading of "Progress of Obscenity and Oysters," Mr. Bennett made an amusingly violent attack on the Sun as follows:

"It appears that this extensive establishment managed by M. Y. Beach and M. M. Noah*, now comprehends in its business arrangements, oysters, shinplasters, obscenity (referring to a sensational booklet exposing the Mormons), Malone and Ulster bank notes, lottery arrangements and post office printing well paid for, thus forming one of the strangest and most remarkable mixtures which ever took place since the captivity of the Israelites in Babylon. In their various offices, cellars and shops this firm does the printing for the Post Office, peddles penny pamphlets, issues bank notes, sells magazines, oysters and laces for political aspirants. Publishes a penny paper and all the filthy publications of the age.

"It is high time that the attention of the Grand Jury was directed to this filthy and desperate concern!"

When one considers that at this time, the offices of the rival newspapers faced each other on Fulton and Nassau Streets, the tense conditions accompanying their publication can well be imagined, and that no physical encounters occurred between the exasperated editors-in-chief, seems almost miraculous.

Subsequently, in a bitter quarrel over the relative sizes of the circulation of the Herald and Sun, Mr. Bennett, in some way secured a letter from the firm that supplied the Sun with paper, and printed it daily in parallel columns with a letter from the concern that supplied him with paper, showing that the Herald used one-third more paper than the Sun. Mr. Bennett at that time claimed a circulation nearly double that of the Sun, adding:

*Noah's paper, the Evening Star had been merged with the Commercial Advertiser, and he had become connected with the Sun.

"The only paper in this city—we may say in the world, which requires a supply of paper, or has a circulation at all approaching that of the Herald, is the Sun, a penny paper, circulating only among the poor people, and through the lanes and back alleys in the city, conducted by one, Moses Y. Beach, a sort of 'cod-fish' aristocrat."

A few days later the Herald printed a squib about Russel Jarvis writing the Sun editorials, "catching the inspiration from the columns of the Herald!"

CHAPTER TWELVE

Mr. Bennett Buys a Permanent Home for the Herald—His Offer to Sell the Paper—Further Instances of His Enterprise

IN 1840, the Herald Office had been temporarily removed to 21 Ann Street. Mr. Bennett was then accumulating funds to buy a suitable, permanent home for his great establishment, and in August, 1841, he purchased a large granite and brick building, located on the northwest corner of Nassau and Fulton streets, and on May 2, 1842, removal was made to these spacious premises. The press rooms, folding and mail rooms occupied the basement. On the ground floor was a large and attractive counting room; on the next floor were the editorial rooms, library and Mr. Bennett's private rooms, while on the floor above were the printers, proofreaders, storage for files, &c. Above this floor was an extensive general job printing office. Four fast double cylinder Hoe presses, driven by his own steam plant enabled Mr. Bennett to cope with his fast growing circulation. His enterprise and energy were apparent in every department. He sent reporters out in boats to meet incoming ships and get from them the news and papers from Europe and other foreign lands. When the Cunard Line steamships began making regular trips to Boston, news collected from them was brought overland, partly by rail, and at points where there were no tracks, relays of horses were provided by the Herald. On June 21, 1841, the extraordinary express of the Herald was stated to have brought the news from London to New York, in 14 days across the Atlantic, via S.S. "Columbia," "exclusively in advance of every other paper."

Making a Gain on a Diminishing Market

If one manufacturer in a given industry should show an increase of say $150,000 for the first third of a "bad year" while his three competitors showed an average loss of almost an equal amount each for the same period and in the same territory—you would look for the reason why.

Call him a newspaper publisher instead of a manufacturer and substitute lines of display advertising for dollars; the first four months of 1924 is the time and Cincinnati the place.

In January, February, March and April, 1924, the Cincinnati Times-Star published 3,226,986 lines of local display advertising and 856,086 lines of national display advertising, a gain of 128,366 lines local and 20,671 lines national, or a total of 149,037 lines increase over the same months in 1923.

There are three other newspapers in Cincinnati, one an evening daily with the same number of publication days as the Times-Star and two morning papers with Sunday magazine editions.

The evening paper showed a falling off in display advertising of 119,805 lines and the morning papers lost respectively 49,049 lines and 237,734 lines of display advertising as compared with the same period of the previous year.

The reason for the Times-Star's consistent gain, even in the face of a falling market, is undoubtedly to be found in the character of the publication itself, its wholesome editorial content, its complete, accurate and up-to-the-minute news service, its outstanding features, its "comics,"—all the factors that make an acceptable home and family newspaper.

These mean circulation, blanket coverage of the market,—and advertising follows such circulation as the needle follows the magnet.

If your sales in Cincinnati have slumped perhaps your advertising schedule needs overhauling.

CHARGE CUSTOMER COVERAGE

How a Big Department Store Measured the Purchasing-Power-Coverage of the St. Louis Newspapers

ONE of St. Louis' largest department stores has measured the purchasing-power-coverage of the St. Louis newspapers.

It has supplied the answer to the question so often asked by advertisers—

> "Which St. Louis newspaper most effectively reaches the families who represent the real buying power of the St. Louis market?"

This department store wanted facts. To obtain them it made a far reaching investigation among its charge customers—the families representing mass-class purchasing power.

Which St. Louis Newspapers Do 31,870 Charge Customers Read?

On January 3, 1924, questionnaires were sent to 31,870 of the store's charge customers to learn which St. Louis newspapers these people read. Replies were received from 14,878—practically 50%.

The results tabulated by certified public accountants, show that the GLOBE-DEMOCRAT most effectively reaches the families with purchasing power in the St. Louis market—both DAILY and SUNDAY!

The Largest Number of These Charge Customers Read the Globe-Democrat

The Globe-Democrat's greater coverage, REGARDLESS OF WHERE THE CHARGE CUSTOMERS LIVE, is shown by the charts above—Daily and Sunday.

The Globe-Democrat has—

Greater coverage, both DAILY and SUNDAY, in Metropolitan St. Louis.

Greater coverage, both DAILY and SUNDAY, in the 49th STATE outside of Metropolitan St. Louis. The 49th State is that great naturally concentrated market defined by a circle, radius 150 miles, of which St. Louis is the natural trading center.

The certified results of the department store's investigation among its charge customers residing in Metropolitan St. Louis verify the results of The St. Louis Newspaper Survey—one of the most comprehensive newspaper investigations ever conducted—which revealed that—

> More copies of the Daily and Sunday Globe-Democrat are read by families living in the high ranking mass-class section of Metropolitan St. Louis, in proportion to total city circulation, than of any other St. Louis newspaper!

83% of the store's charge customers who live in Metropolitan St. Louis reside in the high ranking mass-class section.

The Largest Daily in One of America's Greatest Markets

The Globe-Democrat is the largest daily in the St. Louis market—an area popularly known as the 49TH STATE—one of the greatest markets in America. One pointed to by economic authorities for its exceptional STABILITY.

Here are more than 4,500,000 people. Gigantic sales potentialities for aggressive manufacturers and advertisers.

Unusual opportunities for those whose products are already nationally known, but where greater volume depends upon the intensive development of specific markets.

A profitable territory for those who are building logically toward national demand and distribution by first establishing themselves in certain markets where newspaper coverage is thorough and advertising costs are low.

Sell to the 49th State!

The 49th State has the buyers for your product! The Globe-Democrat REACHES them!

Ask a Globe-Democrat representative to call and give in detail the enlightening facts about this big responsive market—the valuable service which the Service and Promotion Department and Research Division of the Globe-Democrat can render in helping you to sell it—and the complete results of the department store's investigation among its charge customers.

SEEK PERMANENT MARKET FOR CREPE RUBBER SOLES THROUGH NEWSPAPERS

Manufacturers Hope to Lift Product from "Fad" Class Through Advertising—Leather Men Counter-Attack

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

WILL newspaper advertising insure a permanent market for the crepe rubber sole?

You will remember how this type of sole leaped into vogue almost over night a comparatively few months ago. At first these soles were used chiefly on shoes for golf and other sports, but soon all sorts of shoes for summer wear appeared with crepe soles. Dealers featured them, the soles "took" and even the conservative shoe manufacturers included some shoes with crepe soles in the line.

A chemist, formerly with the United States Rubber Company and now in business for himself, is said to have done much to open up this large market. His later experiments and inventions made his firm one of the first sources of supply and at times his small factory has worked night and day to turn out its soles which are trademarked under the name, Rajah.

Other rubber manufacturers "got busy" and soles of crepe rubber were produced in great abundance. At one time a modest newspaper campaign was conducted to urge the public to insist on Rajah Crepe Rubber Soles and to beware of imitations.

Always, the manufacturers in the field have moved with caution.

"It's like all fads. It will have its day and then drop as suddenly as it appeared," one manufacturer of rubber soles told me. "We are glad to produce these soles, but are ready for the inevitable drop which must come in sales."

This is the attitude of most of the other manufacturers.

Very likely they have been "burned" by previous experiences of fads which attained wide proportions and then came to nothing. Certainly, they have done little to build up a market. Most of them have made plays for sales to shoe manufacturers through personal salesmen and this has been the extent of their effort.

Advertising, outside of the one case cited, has been practically nil outside the shoe trade publications.

With greater faith than the American manufacturers, the Rubber Growers' Association, Inc., of London, this Spring began in America a far-reaching campaign to "tell the millions what the thousands already know" about Natural (Plantation finished) Crepe Ruber which the association calls the "Immortal Sole." A national weekly, sporting publications and newspapers are carrying the story to the public and the shoe trade papers are reminding the jobber and retail trade about it.

Although the shoe business right now is in the doldrums, it appears that crepe rubber soles are still in demand. Instead of allowing them to be considered a fad which will live for a day and then fall to obscurity, the association intends for the public demand to grow rather than lessen.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER in its issue of May 19, 1923, outlined what this association has done through newspaper advertising in England to encourage the public to "Use more rubber." A £25,000 (about $125,000) campaign, under the Dorland Agency of London, used a full front page of the Daily Mail, which claims it has the largest net daily sale in the world, and other mediums to cover every province. A book, "Rubber, the product with 1,001 purposes" was distributed to inquirers and also to jobbers and dealers. The copy showed the many different ways rubber goods can be used.

In its large campaign now under way in the United States, the association has shown a similar breadth and understanding of the truth "it pays to build up the other fellow at the same time you build up yourself."

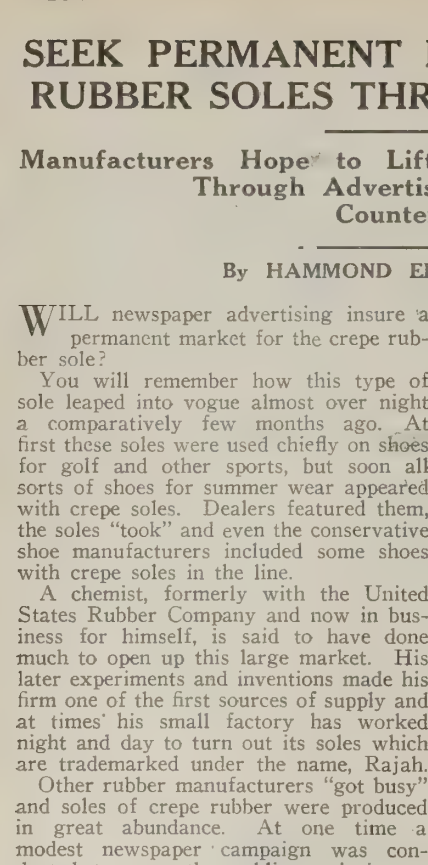
"In other words, it is impossible for the association to benefit from its expenditure in America unless the sole manufacturer, the shoe manufacturer and the dealer "get theirs."

The copy appears on the sporting pages of the newspapers being used. A recent piece of copy was 3 columns wide and considerably over a half page deep, under the heading, "At last—a soul-satisfying sole" above a huge reproduction of a crepe sole. Small figures of people, playing golf or walking gave animation to the advertisement.

The association has prepared a handbook, "The Crepe Rubber Sole," which it volunteers to mail on request to members of the shoe trade.

While the rubber growers are going after the market, the interests indirectly most affected by a permanent shift away from leather soles have been far from inactive. A tremendous national advertising campaign involving a large expenditure over a period of years under the American Sole & Belting Leather Tanners, Inc., an association of 87 competing producers, is under way, with the help of N. W. Ayer & Son.

"Our market has been influenced somewhat for a considerable time by fly-by-night propositions brought out by the makers of substitute material which exists for a time and then dies out," T. R. Elcock, president of the organization of tanners, stated. "Then some other will o' the wisp comes floating into our natural market and again is lost sight of. It seems that it is an attractive field for inventors to endeavor to replace sole leather by fabricated materials.



"There is a strong sentiment in favor of using soles of leather. To keep leather in the favorable opinion of the public we thought it wise to strengthen our position and to educate the public in regard to sole leather. We wish to tell people that sole leather is more reliable, lighter in weight, better in appearance, wears longer, is more comfortable, holds the style of the shoe, and is a real and honest product made from nature's materials with a view to producing the best possible finished material."

Contracts for a period of 3 years were signed with tanners representing 92 per cent of the industry. Five cents per steer hide and four cents per hide on all others go to finance the co-operative advertising, which is not only a means of combatting crepe rubber soles but also all other tendencies of the public away from the all-leather shoe and leather belting.

A campaign, with a first prize of $2,000 for the best letter written about leather and total prizes of $5,000, brought a satisfying response. Signs featuring the slogan, "Nothing takes the place of leather," and other direct-mail promotion have gone to the trade, which also has been reached through trade journals. Motion pictures of tanning and exhibits at expositions of the shoe trade have been part of the program. A new edition of a book, "Nothing takes the place of leather," is being printed. Much of the earlier advertising to the consumer was in the magazines, but more recently full pages in newspapers have been appearing.

The method of paid advertising being used by both rubber and leather industries in this marketing situation reflects the progress being made in enlightened business as contrasted with the "press-agent" seldom-productive route of bygone days.

The fight for a permanent market for crepe rubber soles is on. It is out in the open and clean. Its outcome will be watched with interest.

British copy for the rubber industry, which is now being duplicated in American newspapers. The above was reproduced from a three-column advertisement, about a half page in depth.

JOHN WESLEY BARBER, DEAN OF BOSTON AD MEN, DIES AT 75

Agency Pioneer Had Been Prominent in Advertising for More Than Half a Century—Began With Rowell and Dodd in 1866

JOHN WESLEY BARBER, dean of Boston's advertising men, and president of the J. W. Barber Advertising Agency, one of the oldest in the country, died June 12, at his home in Newton, Mass., aged 75.

He was born in Tuftonboro, N. H., of Mayflower stock and Revolutionary War ancestry. At the age of 11, he was sent to Newbury Seminary, and at 13 he went to Lancaster, N. H., where he combined his studies with the duties of assistant postmaster in a country store.

At Lancaster, he met George P. Rowell, a native of that town, while the latter was on vacation there and, at Mr. Rowell's insistence, when he was a few years older, he spent a summer with Messrs. Rowell and Dodd, pioneers in the Boston advertising agency field. Mr. Barber's career as an "ad man" began on June 1, 1886, and for nearly 60 years, he has been prominent in every movement for the advancement of advertising, the elevation of its standards and the betterment of conditions throughout the United States. Few men had as wide an acquaintance in the advertising and publishing fields.

JOHN WESLEY BARBER

He was about 16 when he entered the employ of George P. Rowell and Horace Dodd, who were then conducting an advertising agency in Boston under the firm name of George P. Rowell & Company. In April, 1867, Rowell & Co. opened their main affice in New York, but Mr. Dodd remained in Boston and with him, Mr. Barber, and in April, 1895, the control of Dodd's Advertising and Checking Agency passed into the hands of the latter. D. Fletcher Barber, a brother, became President of the reorganized company, and J. Westley Barber became its treasurer and general manager.

Meanwhile, Barber had made himself one of the best-posted men in his line, and by dint of his progressive ideas, the old established firm thenceforth made a steady and rapid advance. The agency was virtually a clearing house for advertisers, and the concern's system of sorting, indexing, checking, etc., the result of long practical experience directed toward efficiency in detail, was in those days said to be the most complete of any agency in the country.

In November, 1920, the Pilgrim Publicity Association of Boston honored Mr. Barber with a luncheon at the Boston City Club, at which he was acclaimed as dean of the city's advertising men. His 75th birthday anniversary was celebrated on August 28, last, at the Copley Plaza, and he was the recipient of messages of congratulation from all over the country.

Mr. Barber always retained his interest in outdoor life, and was an enthusiastic mountain climber in his earlier years. He was president and director of the National Recreation Society, organized in 1917 to provide a point of contact between the motor tourist and his host. He was a member of the National Arts Club of New York, the Boston City Club, the Appalachian Mountain Club, Dalhousie Lodge of Masons and Gethsemane Commandery, Knights Templar.

He is survived by his son, Harold F. Barber of Dover, Mass., for the last 18 years manager of the J. W. Barber Advertising Agency, and by a daughter, Mrs. Herbert H. Walley of Newton, Mass. Mrs. Barber died several years ago. Harold Barber will continue as treasurer and general manager of the agency.

PROMINENT AD MEN NAMED ON HARVARD ADVERTISING AWARD JURY

Resor, Nast, Thomson, Barton, Smith, McCann, Parsons Will Aid in Selecting Best Advertising Work of Year for Bok Prizes

THE jury to determine the best advertisements submitted for the Harvard Advertising Awards, founded last fall by Edward Bok to encourage merit and stimulate improvement in advertising, has been selected by the Harvard Business School, administrator of the Awards. The 9 men appointed by Wallace B. Donham, Dean of the Harvard Business School are Stanley Resor, Condé Nast, P. L. Thomson, Bruce Barton, Harry Dwight Smith, H. K. McCann, E. W. Parsons, O. C. Harn, M. T. Copeland and Daniel Starch. All have been active and prominent in the fields of advertising and marketing.

Stanley Resor is the president of the J. Walter Thompson Advertising Company of New York and has been in agency work for more than 20 years. He has been the head of the J. Walter Thompson Company since 1916. He was one of the founders of the American Association of Advertising Agencies and is at present the president of the organization. Condé Nast is the president of the Nast Publications of New York which include Vanity Fair, House and Garden, and Vogue. He was at one time advertising manager and later business manager of Collier's publications. P. L. Thomson, is the publicity manager of the Western Electric Company of New York with which organization he has been for twenty-one years. He is now the president of the Association of National Advertisers.

Bruce Barton, president of Barton, Durstine, and Osborn, advertising agency of New York is an author and lecturer. He is a frequent contributor to the American Magazine and Collier's, and is a lecturer on advertising at New York University. Harry Dwight Smith, of the Fuller and Smith Advertising Agency of Cleveland, has been a member of the Board of the American Association of Advertising Agencies since its organization, and was president of the Association in 1919-20. H. K. McCann, president of the H. K. McCann Company, advertising agents of New York, has had a long experience in the advertising field, and has built up the agency of which he is now the head.

E. W. Parsons, advertising director of the Chicago Tribune, has had long experience in the field of advertising from the point of view of the metropolitan newspaper and its readers. O. C. Harn of New York, is the advertising manager of the National Lead Company. He was active in organizing and was formerly president of the Association of National Advertisers. He brings to the jury an experience in the advertising field in connection with the marketing of a specialized product, through national advertising campaigns.

Dr. Melvin T. Copeland is Professor of Marketing in the Harvard Business School. He is also Director of the School's Bureau of Business Research which investigates the costs of doing business in various trades and collects business problems from executives throughout the country for instructional purposes. Dr. Daniel Starch is Associate Professor of Business Psychology in the Harvard Business School. He has written numerous books on advertising, the most recent of which is "Principles of Advertising."

The fact that the Harvard Business School has undertaken the Administration of a series of prizes for advertising efforts gives a distinct recognition to advertising as an important field, both of literature and of art. It is the desire of the School by thus recognizing advertising to stimulate improvement, both from a literary and artistic as well as from a business point of view.

The Harvard Advertising Awards provide for three types of award. First, a gold medal will be given to the individual who is considered by the Jury of Award to have done most to raise the standards of advertising through acts performed or brought to a culmination during the year. Second, 3 prizes of $1,500 each will be given for the national campaign most conspicuous for the excellence of its planning and execution, for the best local campaign and for the most noteworthy advertising research of the year. Third, there will be four prizes of $1,000 each for the advertisement most effective in its use of English, for the advertisement most effectively accomplishing its purpose in a few words, for the advertisement most effective in its use of typography, and for the advertisement most effective in its use of pictorial illustration in any form.

The detailed organization of the jury has not been announced. According to Dean Donham the jury will probably be divided into committees corresponding to the classes of awards.

A cheerful loser believes that he sees a way to get back what he has lost; that is what makes him cheerful.—Wabash Times-Star.

What Europe Is Saying About America

By FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE

FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE

Europe five years after the World War is far different from the Europe Frederic William Wile quitted in 1919 after having covered European Capitals for American newspapers for twenty years. Wile was an American reporter in London during the Boer War. During the World War he was with the A.E.F. as an expert on Germany. The intervening years of newspaper work gave him an intimate knowledge of Europe which few Americans share.

Frederic William Wile, following five years of newspaper writing in Washington, will return to Europe to feel the pulse of Britain, Ireland and the Continent. What Europe thinks about us will be presented in ten articles during the month of August. These articles will reveal a true cross section of the European mind as it contemplates the United States.

This is an outstanding newspaper feature, available in all but twenty cities. Telegraph for an option and details.

A. B. C. HAS IMPROVED PUBLISHING ETHICS SINCE FOUNDING 10 YEARS AGO

History, Purposes and Ideals of Bureau Told by Stanley Clague—Has Saved Thousands of Dollars for Publishers and Advertisers

By STANLEY CLAGUE

Managing Director, Audit Bureau of Circulations

TEN years ago this month of June there assembled in the city of Chicago, Ill., a hopeful group of publishers, advertisers and advertising agents from all parts of the United States and Canada.

STANLEY CLAGUE

They were termed "Idealists," by those who refused to attend the conference. "Theoretically, beautiful," they said, "but the result will be the same as that which occurred to the proverbial snowball on its way South. You cannot get the advertiser and the advertising agent and the publisher together in one fold. As well expect the lion and the lamb to lie down together."

What did result?

One object of this hopeful group was to bring publishers and advertising interests together for the common purpose of eradicating an evil which was devastating both industries—circulation falsification. The circulation liar was rampant. Not all publishers lied, but there were many who did and it was commonly regarded as being ethically correct if a publisher's representative would first ascertain what his competitor's circulations claim was and then go him several thousand, or a hundred thousand if necessary, better.

The sky was the limit in those days.

This not only injured and retards advertising, but in no small degree was injurious to and retarded the publishing business.

Much time of the advertiser and the advertising agent was devoted to listening to the story of the wonderful halo which bedecked the head of one publisher and then a similar amount of time was given to the competitor to demonstrate that the man with the halo was a liar, a thief and one whose word could not be believed, even if a sworn statement was made on a five-foot shelf of Bibles.

With the result that the space buyer generally credited them both as being unworthy of credence.

And so untold hundreds of thousands of dollars were wasted annually in the time spent by both the buyer and the seller.

That day has passed in the United States and Canada.

In the decade which has elapsed since that memorable meeting in Chicago in 1914, there has been established a new relationship between the buyer and the seller of advertising space. Doubt and chicanery have been very substantially reduced. With rare exceptions the advertiser can accept the circulation statement of the publisher, if it has stamped on it that significant symbol "A. B. C." and say: "Well, that's that for circulation. No let us proceed to the consideration of your field and to the particular merits of your publication for the sale of my product in your field."

And every dollar spent by the advertiser becomes more nearly a productive dollar.

This naturally benefits the publisher. But he also benefits in another way. The work of the A. B. C. is driving slowly but surely the deliberate liar and falsifier from the field by reducing the revenue he can secure from such falsification.

Col. J. B. MacLean, one of the leading publishers in Canada, said a few days ago at a gathering of A. B. C. Directors, publishers and advertisers in Toronto: "If the A. B. C. had been in existence when I began business—if it had been doing the wonderful work it is now doing—my work would have been vastly easier and vastly more successful."

But this hopeful group which assembled in Chicago did not confine itself merely to the question of figures and figuring. It aimed to establish a fundamental business relationship which would do away with a chaos of terminology and establish a standardization of circulation which would inspire confidence. The determination of a total net figure of sales was, of course, desirable; but in their opinion there was something just as important to achieve in determining and showing the nature of that circulation. They believed that sometimes a circulation of 20,000 was just as valuable as if not more valuable than a circulation of 40,000 to an advertiser.

And so they set about the task of showing how the circulation was obtained, where it went and in the case of business publications the class and character of readers. It hedged safeguards about circulation, which protected the advertiser and the honest publisher. It raised danger signals which, while at first were somewhat resented, eventually were recognized as being for the common good.

Have these things resulted in substantial and permanent benefit?

The answer can best be shown in demonstrated results.

The nucleus of that 1914 meeting has now increased so that today over 90 per cent of the publishing and advertising business concerned in national or general advertising is represented in A. B. C. membership, combining all classes of publications — newspapers, magazines, farm papers and business publications—and calculating their circulation in single copies, the A. B. C. audits annually over eleven billion single copies in which the advertiser's message appears.

Aside from the advertising of local merchants, which runs into expenditures of many hundreds of millions of dollars annually (these merchants are relying more and more on A. B. C. data) there is placed in the United States and Canada nearly $400,000,000 of national or general advertising, which is very largely and in many individual cases wholly placed with A. B. C. publications.

Has this brief statement of the history, purposes and ideals of the Audit Bureau of Circulations any significance for our friends across the sea, who will assemble at the 1924 convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World in July? I think so.

O. C. Harn, President of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, who has, with so many other of our leaders in the publishing and advertising world in the United States and Canada, unselfishly devoted their time, without recompense, to the development of these ideals, will address this convention and meet with the leaders to offer on behalf of the Bureau our utmost assistance in the advancement of similar ideals throughout the civilized world.

We are in constant communication with publishers and advertisers in a dozen different countries. Publishers from these countries visit our headquarters frequently. We realize, therefore, that they all have individual problems to solve, which must be individually solved. But the fundamental basis is the same. The publishers and advertisers of the United States and Canada through the Audit Bureau of Circulations, places the result of a decade of experience at your disposal, as our contribution to the advancement of international standards, and the raising higher of that banner "Truth in Advertising," which, as it waves in the halls of your deliberations, will not only be a symbol of service, but an inspiration for the attainment of higher ideals throughout the 1924 convention of the A. A. C. W.

BEAUTIFUL STORY OF A TREE

Recently Martin L. Davey, of Ohio, made a speech in the House of Representatives, concerning trees as living things, and deploring the forest devastation in America.

In the course of his address he told this touching story, as it was related to him by the President of the Rotary Club of Elyria, Ohio:

"I have the most wonderful tree in the world out at my house. Some 15 years ago I had a little boy who was then 3 years of age. In the early fall he would go out to gather up the buckeyes, sometimes by pocketfuls and sometimes by basketfuls, and would bring them in and play with them. One day he took sick. The next day he was better, so he went out as usual and brought in just one large fine buckeye and played with it; and the next day he died.

"I took that large, fine buckeye and carried it with me all the long winter. I took it out every little while and looked at it and was reminded of him. And then when the springtime came, I went out and planted it down under his sand pile. Later the sand was taken away and the buckeye sprouted and came up, a healthy little plant. Then I built a fence around it to protect it, and I called the boys of the neighborhood together and told them the story. I asked them to help me protect this tree. I told them they might break anything else I had, the windows in my house, my automobile or anything else, but please don't break this tree. They have respected that request, and the tree stands there today 15 years old, a healthy young specimen, the most wonderful tree in the world."

Mr. Davey said that Gov. Gifford Pinchot had recently said to him: "Mr. Davey, in my judgment there will be a lumber famine in this country within 25 years, and such a lumber famine will make itself felt before the end of the 25-year period."

He concluded: "It seems to me that the all-important thing for us as a government is to buy up the cheap waste lands, millions of acres—according to report, '81,000,000 acres so severely cut and burned as to become an unproductive waste'—and reforest that as a Government project, and forever keep it under the Government regulations as to methods of cutting."

The Greatest Newspaper Advertising Gain In America

THE Sun's total advertising gain in 1924 has now reached approximately 4,800 columns—nearly a million and a half agate lines; an average gain of more than 900 columns each month in the first five months of this year compared with the corresponding months in 1923.

This is by far the largest advertising gain for this period made by any newspaper in America, despite the fact that The Sun is published only six days a week excluding Sunday, while most other newspapers with large gains are published seven. It includes large increases in the national, local and classified divisions of advertising; and in department stores, automobiles, women's specialty, men's wear, radio, real estate, summer resorts, religious notices, furniture, jewelry, newspapers and musical instruments among important advertising classifications.

From the point of view of the British advertiser, it is additionally significant that the great, high-grade New York shops which frequently advertise trademarked goods of British manufacture, use more and increasingly more space in The Sun than in any other New York daily newspaper.

The Sun is a distinguished, influential newspaper, read by the more intelligent and prosperous of all classes in New York city—the world's richest market. The Sun's great, consistent and continuing growth again emphasizes the fact that from the advertiser's point of view, quality and known purchasing power are the important elements in newspaper circulation.

The more than 250,000 daily purchasers of The Sun constitute the largest circulation of high-class readers attained by any New York evening newspaper.

PROOFREADER CHIDES CARELESSNESS OF MEN ON THE DESK

Delivers Amiable Discourse to Would-Be Copy Readers Regarding Science of Capitalization, Spelling and Head Writing

By HARRY R. DAWLEY

TO the unsophisticated young mind absorbing its preliminary impressions in the atmosphere of the editorial rooms it may appear that, in all the vast field of journalistic endeavor, reading copy is the least difficult thing to do; that the chief requisite one must possess to enable him to qualify as a copy reader is ability to deftly manipulate the ubiquitous scissors and smear-brush without falling into the paste-pot and to apply the inevitable blue pencil where he conceives it will do the most good. That this conception of the work is wholly erroneous, however, soon becomes obvious even to the most sluggish-minded.

As a conning tower from which to watch the functioning of the various departments of a daily newspaper office the proofroom has unsurpassed advantages. From its vantage point one soon becomes familiar with the practices and mental processes of editors and copy readers; and intimate contact with their work gives rise to certain inescapable impressions, which the proofreader acquires by absorption rather than through any directed effort to study methods and detect shortcomings. As a result of his observations the proofreader has concluded that to be a successful copy reader one must be endowed with a certain spark of genius that is not usually observable in the average reporter; that therefore the "average" reporter should philosophically decide to remain an "average" reporter, for it is only those who have inherited or acquired certain approved mental characteristics who may hope successfully to aspire to the coveted chair at the desk.

A city editor, once asked to describe the duties of a copy reader, replied that they consisted principally of "killing adjectives." If a veteran proofreader were to be confronted by a similar request for information by an aspiring young man who finally had achieved his ambition to sit as executioner on these superfluous parts of speech, he might be tempted to plunge into detail and, in an amiable desire to be helpful, deliver himself of something like this:

"In the first place, you should adopt as your slogan, 'Safety First!' Many occasions will arise when it will become necessary for you either to assume responsibility for an error or 'pass the buck,' and you should be prepared to meet the emergency boldly and without hesitation. To be 'caught with the goods' may mean reduction to the ranks. And of course you do not want to go down—you want to go up.

"If your developing talent is not sufficiently appreciated on the Daily Bazoo, and you should decide to transfer your activities to the Daily Gazoo, do not fail to carry with you to your new duties as many of the details of 'style' of type composition that prevailed on the Bazoo as the recesses of your mental equipment will accommodate. This will enable you to proceed forthwith, without asking foolish questions, to edit your copy to conform to the style used on the Bazoo, notwithstanding that it may be completely at variance with the style on the Gazoo. There is always a possibility that your copy, when sent to the composing room to be put into type, will reach the hands of a strange or 'green' compositor, who will make the common error of believing that the man who edited it knew what he was doing and why he was doing it; consequently, the compositor will conscientiously follow the editing, with the result that his proof soon will be returned from the discriminating hand of the proofreader bearing the earmarks of a preliminary draft of an Egyptian war map. This need not worry you, however, for the story when it appears in print will conform strictly to the Gazoo style, and nobody but the proofreader and the compositor will be the wiser. If the foreman of the composing room should inadvertently see the proof, he may mildly reprove the compositor for not knowing the Gazoo style and 'cuss out' the proofreader for knowing it too well; but the copy reader will be safe; he never will be suspected and may continue his little joke along these lines almost indefinitely without fear of detection.

"One of the most essential details of the copy reader's art is the little angular pencil mark that denotes the beginning of each paragraph. Notwithstanding that the cleanly typewritten manuscript of the author already indicates the paragraphs, do not neglect to give this detail the thoughtful attention which its importance deserves. Do not permit your mind to be diverted by the appearance of some involved sentence in which the author's meaning is obscured; by the incorrect use of verbs, or by other trivialities; just concentrate on what you were doing, and continue to indicate the already clearly indicated paragraphs. Failure to do this may result in the compositor maliciously 'running in' all those paragraphs 'solid'—for it is traditional among printers that compositors abominate setting quad lines; it fattens their 'strings' and may give the foreman a false impression of their speed.

"In handling manuscript from the press association tickers, or any other manuscript that is typed all in capital letters, one should be careful to triply underscore the initial letters of such rare words as New York, London, Paris, Berlin, and the like, to make it unmistakably plain to the compositor that they should be capitalized; but waste no time in indicating the capitalization of apparently meaningly words cabled from Poland, Russia, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and other foreign lands. The chances are that few, if any, of the readers of the Gazoo ever saw or heard of the words before, anyhow, and therefore will be ignorant of their meaning, so you still will be playing safe. Of course, the proofreader may hand you a few well-selected adjectives from his abundant vocabulary; it's no more than fair that he should have an occasional chance to hurl an epithet at somebody—he's only human, like yourself, and is entitled to occasional relaxation.

"While on the subject of foreign matter it may be well to mention the use of accented letters. Don't be bothered by such inconsequential details; pass 'em up—let the compositor guess. If he should guess wrong, that will afford the erudite proofreader still another opportunity to exploit his superior attainment.

"In writing heads, first determine just how many letters will go into the line, then add one or two more. The composing room foreman has a specially constructed rubber 'stick' reserved for just such emergencies and is always glad to use it. Also, it is advisable to write your o's and a's and u's and n's, and other letters that are similar, in such a way that one cannot be distinguished from the other. Attention should be given to this detail, especially in proper names. Another approved practice is to lend a little variety by spelling an individual's name at least two ways—one way in the head and another way in the story. When using a typewriter, if a vagrant finger should commit the error of wandering to the figure 5 key when you aimed at a 6, don't use an eraser: just give the backspacer a punch and hit the 6 over the 5. The compositor will know at a glance which one you intended to 'go.' If the poor fish doesn't, let him guess once more—he's a glutton for mental exercise.

"Be painstaking with your guide lines; always write them illegibly. Keep the secret of their meaning discreetly to yourself. If you are handling an obituary that you wish to identify with the guide line 'Grant,' write it so the compositor will mistake it for 'Giant,' and so set it. If, as a consequence, the story appears in the first edition on the sporting page under a baseball heading telling how 'Pirates Make Giants Walk Plank,' don't worry; mistakes are bound to happen, and the blunder probably will be 'caught' in the second edition—in the third, anyhow—and it usually can be ascribed to the carelessness of the bone-headed makeup.

Words that are a shade off in meaning always are permissible. For instance: If a reporter wishes to use the word 'replica' because he likes the way it sounds, be charitable, and comfort yourself with the delusive fancy that the words 'reproduction' and 'ectype' long ago became obsolete and passed into disuse. If a derelict in police court is unable to remember his family history, refer to him in your headline as a victim of 'aphasia.' Do not ruthlessly deprive the eagerly expectant proofreader of the ecstatic privilege of substituting for 'aphasia' the word 'amnesia.' Use the word 'comprise' for 'compose' as often as your conscience will permit; if anything should appeal to your artless imagination as being unusual, be sure to say that it is 'unique' (which it isn't), and always refer to the Olympic games as the 'Olympiad' (which they aren't). In brief, should you be seized by an unholy impulse to trespass upon the lexicological domain of the proofreader, resolutely refrain. The latter should be given some latitude to demonstrate his value, and his usefulness progressively diminishes with the increase in efficiency of the copy-reading staff. Therefore, have a heart!

"Consult reference books sparingly. If in doubt, make memory serve; otherwise you may get too many things right—and one never should assert an iconoclastic desire to kick holes in any of the ancient traditions of the copy desk.

"Finally, don't worry. Whether you are editing the polished phrases of a Brander Matthews or the crude initial efforts of the newest acquisition to the ranks of the cubs, 'go to it' with equal serenity and self-confidence, and never release your manuscript until it bears visible evidence that you are alert and 'on the job'—make an occasional emendation with your trusty blue pencil whether it is needed or not.

"With these suggestions always uppermost in the copy reader's mind his situation never should be in jeopardy. At any rate, untold numbers are 'getting away with it' along these lines, and the one who should prove to be an exception would be unfortunate indeed."

Must Be Salable

"The first requisite of a newspaper is that it be salable. It may be superfine from every ethical, intellectual and educative standpoint, but if it is not salable it is without value. For whatever the purpose of its production, however high the motives that prompt its creation, that purpose cannot be accomplished unless it has readers, and it will not have readers unless it continuously supplies news that interest them and that sufficiently induces them to buy."—Casper S. Yost, St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Why there is no keyboard on the Ludlow

EVERY step in the development of the Ludlow System has been measured by simplicity—simplicity in construction; simplicity in operation. This simplicity makes for flexibility, economy and speed, for it enables the Ludlow operator to produce quickly a wide range of typesizes on slugs, and without magazine, machine or mold changes.

To put a keyboard on the Ludlow would be to place mechanical limitations upon the very work for which it was created. The Ludlow was not built for long runs of small body matter but was and is designed for producing in slug lines all that great mass of composition which can be set most effectively and most economically by hand.

The fact that you can set all size and face combinations in the same slug lines, without magazine, mold or machine changes, demonstrates the simplicity and flexibility of the Ludlow System. The smaller type sizes, from 6 to 12 point, are being widely used to advantage on the Ludlow. The Ludlow is the only system for producing in slug lines full width 42 point, 48 point and 60 point sizes, including bold and extended faces. It is the ideal system for all display advertising which ranges in size from 6 to 60 point.

Several compositors can operate the Ludlow at the same time, each setting the sizes and faces he needs and without the slightest interference of one operator with another. This is just one other advantage that makes the Ludlow System the most important factor in the composing room.

JACKSON: "Steward says 'Don't worry about the three-mile limit!' Where the amber color ends and the blue begins—that's it!"

JIGGS: "Once home and we'll all join in and sing 'The Presidential Blues.'"

JACKSON: "Yep! Nice bright outlook! Business holding off—everybody running true to form—playing 'still-tag' until after election! Meanwhile, fellows, we can put our convention pep and ideas in moth balls."

JONES: "Cheerio! Lay off the blues! There's always one place you can try out the inspirations and be sure of a normal reaction—the old reliable market that slumps never touch——"

JACKSON: "Says which?"

JONES: "You know, old topper—the Milwaukee-Wisconsin market—always reliable, always good!"

JIGGS: "Hear ye! Hear ye! Now I'll tell one!"

JACKSON: "Come! Come! Be yourself, Jones!"

JONES: "Remember, boys, I was born in Missouri. And what's more I am still my old dashing self, Jackson. But Wisconsin really did 'show me'—not once, but many times."

JACKSON: "But——"

JIGGS: "Mistuh Jackson, be quiet, the gentleman from Missouri—Wisconsin—Newark has the floor! Proceed, suh!"

JONES: "Here's the dope! First, Wisconsin is the richest dairying state in the world—bar none!"

JIGGS: "He says no more bars!"

JONES: "Wisconsin produces 10 per cent of the total dairy products of the nation—and three-fourths of all the cheese!"

JACKSON: "Your argument is full of holes!"

JONES: "My remarks are going to your head, apparently! Here's the other angle to consider—Milwaukee is the first city in America in diversity of industry! Try and laugh that off, boys! There you have a market with an agricultural background of substantial steady revenue from dairy products, and a manufacturing center that cannot be affected by slumps in any one or several lines. Everything goes on lovely just the same because the great variety of industries prevents a general depression."

JIGGS: "Why talk about cows and dairying and cheese? You can drink milk tomorrow—but today you don't have to."

JONES: "——and don't get the idea that Milwaukee is Podunk, either! The trouble with you, Jackson, you still think they kill Indians every day in Chicago! There's three million people in the Milwaukee-Wisconsin market. It's large, but not unwieldy—just the right size—furnishes a good volume of business and you can keep your fingers on it. It's the best place I know of for a tryout campaign, if you want dependable reactions—no abnormal conditions—stability, y'know!"

JACKSON: "Must be hard to break into this business Utopia of yours, eh wot, Old Top?"

JONES: "No harder and no easier than any other. But here's the bally old secret—it costs less! The pun's, shillin' an' pence—economy—and all that sort of thing, y'know! Here's how—one newspaper covers the place like a bloomin' mackintosh, d'y'understand? And pull? Say, I thought our suspenders would give out when we started back in '20!"

JACKSON: "Huh—how about the rates, old thing? Wager they get you there, eh?"

JONES: "Taken! You're all wrong ——"

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT WINS FIGHT AGAINST STATE WAGE COMMISSION

Supreme Court Holds Newspapers May Refuse to Print Ads Despite Mandatory Laws—Inimical to Freedom of Press

NEWSPAPERS have the right to refuse to publish advertisements offered by the State Minimum Wage Commission, calling attention to the fact that a manufacturing or mercantile concern has failed to comply with rulings of the commission respecting wages and hours of labor, according to a decision of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in the case of State vs. the Boston Transcript, handed down June 14, by the full bench.

The Boston Transcript had refused to publish, at the behest of the commission, an advertisement stating that one of Boston's foremost mercantile establishments had declined to make effective for its employes the hours and minimum wage scales fixed by that board. The commission took the case to the superior court, where the law was upheld on the basis of a statement of agreed facts, and a fine imposed on the Transcript as the basis for a test case. The Transcript filed an immediate apeal from the lower court's action, and the case went up to the supreme court on points of law, the newspaper setting forth its contention that the statute, as enacted by the Legislature, was a violation of constitutional rights, both state and Federal, and an infringement on the freedom of the press as well.

The decision, set down by Chief Justice Arthur P. Rugg, upheld the contentions of the Transcript in every respect, and promptly declared that the statute in question was unconstitutional. Other Boston newspapers had published advertisements offered by the commission, but these had related chiefly the industrial establishments of the smaller type.

The decision states in part: "The effect of the statute is to compel the publisher of any newspaper, selected by the public board established by the statute, to print the matter offered by the board in accordance with the statute, at the rate specified in the statute. The publisher has no option. He must print. He cannot negotiate as to the rate he will charge. His regular rate to the general public for space fixes the price to be paid to him. He can received no more.

"The contract to publish at that price is imposed upon him as an absolute obligation by the simple request of the public board. He may be the only owner of a newspaper so requested. He may not want to print the designated matter at the rate commonly charged for space. It may not be for his business advantage so to print it. He may not want to print it at any price. His preference, desires or financial advantage or detriment are entitled to no consideration under the statute. This class of advertising may be pecularly onerous. It may be especially disagreeable from a business standpoint. Its fair market value, regarded as space occupied may be much greater than the price commonly charged for business advertisements of the usual character. Conditions can readily be conceived where these factors would exist. No one of them or others of a kindred nature can be weighed under the terms of the statute. The proprietor of the newspaper selected by the public board must publish at the stated price, not matter how great may be the practical loss to him.

"The protection afforded to the publisher against liability for libellous publications made pursuant to the statute is of uncertain nature. The constitutional power of the Legislature to deprive one altogether of his right of action against the publisher of a libel may well be open to doubt. The right of speedy remedy for injuries or wrongs to character is established on the same footing as injuries or wrongs to persons and property by Article XI of the Declaration of Rights."

Who Pays for Advertising?

Who pays for advertising? I'll tell you. The one who pays the factory rent; the one who pays for the machinery used in the factory; the one who pays for packing the goods; the one who pays distribution costs; the one who pays the salesman's commissions and expenses; the one who pays the profits of manufacturer, jobber, retailer; the one who pays the uncollected accounts of all three; the one who pays all the cost of every kind connected with production, distribution and selling, makes up business losses, pays business profits and complains more about the cost of advertising than all the other overhead items combined. The consumer. But it is his investment and it brings him rich returns.—Walter Sammis, Business Department, New York Times, before advertising department of New York State Publishers' Association, Gloversville, N. Y.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"We ought to be a little slower—more accurate."—Charles McD. Puckette

"A NEWSPAPER that will cover all the news and will be written so that it will be read with interest by the layman and respect by the authority."

That is Charles McD. Puckette's ideal of a newspaper. Puckette is now on the New York Times in the advertising censorship department, under Louis Wiley, business manager. He went there from the New York Evening Post of which he was managing editor for 6 years and previously, reporter, city editor, and assistant managing editor for 16 years.

"Newspapers ought to be better literature," he remarked to me not long ago. He still talks with a Southern drawl.

"Just now many newspapers aren't careful enough. We ought to be a little slower, a little more accurate. Stories should be better written.

"You know yourself the saying 'that's just newspaper talk' is getting altogether too common.

"We don't do our jobs quite well enough. That's the trouble. Everyone on a newspaper has got to do his job completely.

"Reporters should be better trained. Of course we don't want newspapers written entirely by experts. I hate the connotation of the word expert, anyway. But a newspaper staff, I think, should be a staff of expert newspaper men, thorough masters of whatever they cover."

Puckette's ideas on newspapering come both from experience and inheritance. He represents the third generation of Puckettes who have devoted their lives to newspaper making.

Charles C. J. Puckette, his grandfather, established the Natchitoches (La.) Times. This elder Puckette was a pioneer newspaper publisher in the South. In the days when he was in the business during the post-war period of poverty, he used to draw his own cartoons and engrave them on blocks of wood. He attacked the carpet baggers vigorously. Charles McD. Puckette of the next generation was a prominent newspaper man of New Orleans. There he was political editor of the New Orleans Times-Democrat and later the Item.

This Puckette, father of the present member of the Times staff, was in New Orleans at a time, when to possess the title of political writer was equivalent to owning a rapid transit ticket to the Beyond. He had several narrow escapes.

At one time, a man angered by Puckette's fiery political writing silently entered his office and shot him in the back. Puckette, badly wounded, crawled to the doorway and shot his assailant to death as he attempted flight on a bicycle.

Such an adventure so close to home might, of course, have reacted against Charles McD., Jr., and kept him out of a career of newspapering. But it did not, and, after he was graduated from the University of the South at Sewanee with a B. A. in 1907, and an M. A. in 1908, he came to the New York Evening Post.

On the Post, Puckette believes he received invaluable training from Robert E. MacAlarney who was city editor while he was cub reporter.

"A great deal of one's newspaper sense comes from what one gradually absorbs in the business. But MacAlarney was essentially a teacher. He made his city room a regular class room, and I believe many city editors today might well profit by his example," Puckette declared.

Sympathy Expressed for Former President in Telegram

Charlie Miller, former president of the Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives, did not attend last week's annual meeting, at Columbus, owing to the serious illness of Mrs. Miller, at Baltimore, following a serious operation several weeks ago.

News from Baltimore this week was that while still seriously ill, the physicians held out hope for Mrs. Miller's ultimate recovery.

The following telegram was sent to Mr. Miller, from Columbus:

"Charlie Miller,

"The Baltimore News, Baltimore, Md.

"Members of Association of Newspaper Advertising Executives desire to express sincere sympathy and hope for rapid recovery of Mrs. Miller. The Association feels deepest gratitude to Mrs. Miller for sacrifices made by her when you were unselfishly promoting the interests of this Association and the newspaper cause.

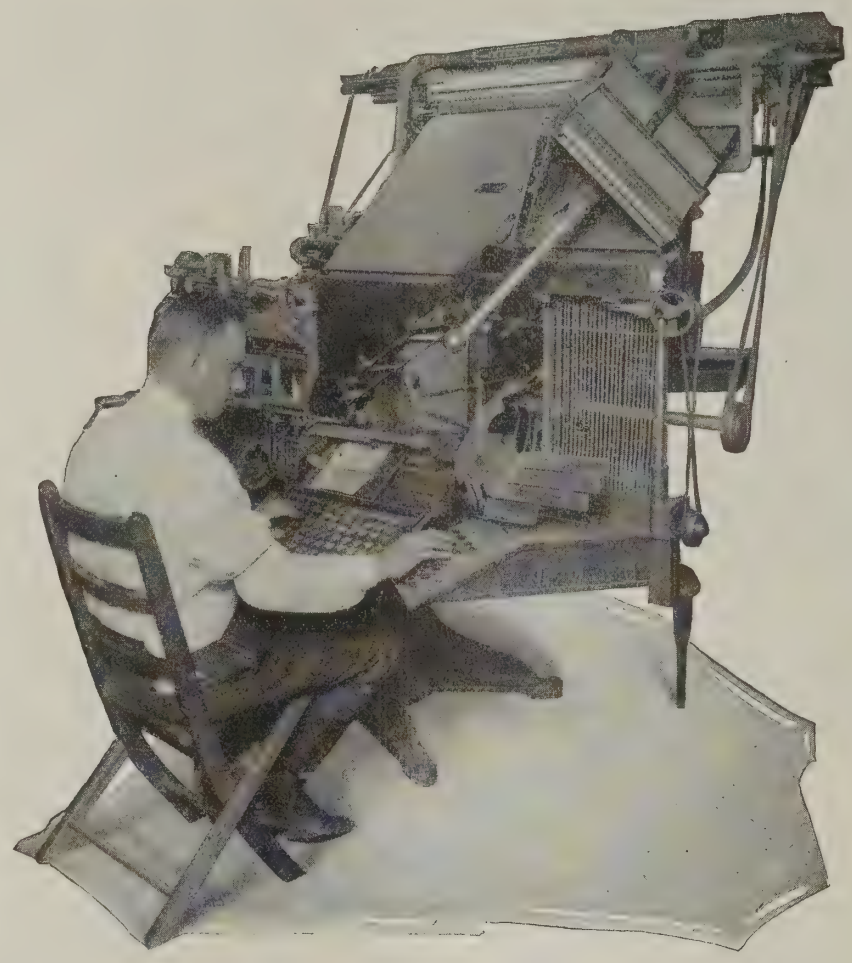
Country's Mineral Center Located In ILLINOIS

When we think of Illinois it is seldom, or never, in respect to coal mining—but it is nevertheless a source of great wealth.

Bituminous coal underlies more than half the area of the state. Illinois stands third among all the states in mineral output. The production of bituminous coal is valued at $240,000,000.

Illinois is also a large producer of petroleum and natural gas. The latest statistics on oil production cite a figure of 15,000,000 barrels for the year.

Illinois is one of our wealthiest states. It ranks third in production of field crops from agriculture, third in manufactures, third in population and third in mining. As a railroad state it has the heaviest tonnage in the United States.



Illinois daily newspapers are among the best in the country in influence and pulling power. Concentrate your efforts in this territory and it will produce maximum results.

These Illinois daily newspapers, having the spirit of cooperation, do their bit by helping to merchandise advertised products, rendering their services of particular value to manufacturers who appreciate and reciprocate the cooperative spirit which helps to make the wheels of business go round.

The INTERTYPE

A growing factor in the Advertising, Publishing and Printing Industries

Advertising men are the indirect buyers of composition. Much of your newspaper display is now set on Intertypes. Likewise trade paper display, book work, and many kinds of commercial printing. You will therefore be interested, and occasionally perhaps find some profit in knowing what the Intertype is and what it can do.

The Intertype is a slug composing machine, setting complete lines of type in all sizes from 5-point up to full width 36-point bold and 60-point bold condensed, in slugs up to 42 ems in length.

Although only eleven years old, it has already won a position commanding a substantial percentage of the world's line composing machine business. The popularity of the Intertype is steadily growing and annual Intertype sales run into many millions of dollars.

The Intertype has gained its present standing largely through mechanical merit and economy of operation and maintenance. More than thirty major and many minor Intertype improvements and simplifications have been developed. On one type of machine, 910 unnecessary moving parts were eliminated from one mechanism alone by a new design which functions and wears better than the old one. Parts which do not exist cannot wear out.

But probably the most important thing that Intertype has done for the industry is the introduction of the idea of Standardization in slug-casting machines. The standard Intertype basic unit is built up with various other standardized units to suit the purchaser's needs. Still more units can be added at any time in the future, and even new inventions are standardized and made applicable to outstanding Intertypes. From the basic Intertype machine, 32 styles of machines can be built by the addition of standardized equipment. No Standardized Intertype has ever become obsolete.

Intertypes are now being used in eighteen European and South American countries, and in Japan, India, Iceland, Palestine, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Hawaii, and the Philippine Islands.

The Intertype Corporation is entirely independent. It is not controlled, directly or indirectly, financially or otherwise, by any other organization.

DAY OF CLEVER, HIGH-PRESSURE AGENCY SALESMAN PASSING

Large Advertisers Judging Campaign Layouts Without Calling in Agency Representative "Encouraging," Says Durstine

By ROY S. DURSTINE

Barton, Durstine and Osborn, Inc.

A CERTAIN advertising agency had been working for several months on its plans for a new client. Its suggestions were completed. A request for a meeting was sent to the advertiser. Word came back that the suggestions would be considered on a certain date—but that the agency needn't appear.

It was explained that this company's executives liked to look over proposed plans quietly, without argument, and without being influenced by salesmanship.

If that isn't a symptom of progress, Caslon type is hard to read.

The agency had thought clear through its subject. It had tested its ideas in every conceivable way. It had worked with the advertiser's sales department, with his factory men, with his advertising heads. It had run investigations from door to door and from store to store.

It had written and drawn its advertisements; it had revised them and then re-revised them.

And then it took the results of its inquiries and the last of its copy and layouts and put them in a great big book—arranged in such orderly fashion that understanding everything was no more trouble than turning the pages.

So the book went to the meeting and the agency stayed at home.

A week later the book came back, approved as was.

Contrast that experience with the mass-meeting type of presentation which was general a few years ago. It was a battle royal in which the advertiser ranged his forces on one side of the long table and the agency's representatives brought out its bag of tricks on the other.

The agency read its plan or did its best to paraphrase many typewritten sheets by a colloquial recital of its ideas. The man chiefly responsible for the plan, being mostly creative, was probably not a very good talker. Under the cold eyes of the advertiser's forces he stammered a good deal. An occasional sharp question didn't make him any smoother.

The layouts which had looked very novel and effective back at the agency's office somehow seemed to have lost their sparkle. The copy sounded flat.

At the end of the presentation the president looked about him.

"Any comments?" he asked.

And then the fun began. Executives who had come to the meeting without a definite thought were quick to voice opinions; usually they began:

"Now, of course, I don't pretend to know anything about advetising, but—"

The discouraging part of it was that they advanced these opinions not because by so doing they were helping the company to find greater success but because they knew they were expected to comment and if they didn't it might count against them.

In 15 minutes the remnants of those suggestions were scattered up and down the table.

Then the agency's big league salesman went to bat. He hadn't made the presentation because, to be perfectly frank, he had had only a few minutes to glance over it in the taxicab on the way to the meeting.

But he was familiar with it now! He had been listening, making a few notes, watching the faces of each commentor. And he went into action.

Two hours later, when the meeting adjourned, the president beamed across the table as he shook hands with the powerful salesman and exclaimed:

"Well, this is great! We may be hard to sell, because we like to be shown. But you've convinced us and now we're all ready to go ahead!"

It's often said that the American public loves a fight. So did the American business man of this president's type. But the trouble was that he became so engrossed in the conflict of wills that the poor subject under discussion, like all bystanders, was the sufferer. The thing became a game, a battle of wits, an oratorical contest.

The winner was not necessarily the man with the best arguments. He was the man with the best vocabulary and the most convincing personality. Many a first rate idea has died in a meeting of this kind because its sponsor was an unskilled advocate. And many a second rate idea has been adopted with enthusiasm because it was ably presented at the right time by a clever talker.

So the action of that advertiser in deciding to consider his agency's recommendations quietly and without benefit of salesmanship is respectfully submitted as Encouraging Symptom Number One.

It is indicative of a very marked change in the attitude of the advertiser in the past few years. He used to expect his agent to be a good mixer. Today there is practically no demand for hand-shaking. He used to shop around for catchy, half-baked ideas in advertising. He knew they were catchy when he saw them, but he didn't find out they were half-baked until the returns came in. He used to feel that changing agencies every so often was a wholesome way of shaking up his organization. Today he knows that he begins to get his most valuable service from his agency only after it has become as much a part of his company as his other seasoned executives. He used to prefer to be sold. Now he wants to buy.

Look at another side of the advertising triangle—the advertiser, the publisher and the agent. Consider the change that has come over the selling of space by publishers. There was a time when the man who received a call from a publisher's representative could just about anticipate every word of any solicitation. If it was for a magazine it probably began:

"Hello, old man! I just thought I'd drop in to let you have a look at this advance copy. We certainly are getting out a good-looking book. Run your eye over that table of contents. Ever see anything like it? All the big names are there. And how the public is eating it up! Here's a confidential memorandum I just got from our circulation manager. He'd go crazy if he knew that I was showing it outside the office, but look at that print order for next month! We just can't hold it back. The public simply walks up to the stands and carries it away. You're seeing it regularly, aren't you? What? Do you mean to say you're not on our mailing list? Well, I'll fix that as soon as I get back to the office. So long! Keep us in mind!"

One publishing house has swung so far in the opposite direction that at least two of its best solicitors can't quote rates from memory, have only the haziest ideas of their A. B. C. figures and would have to call up their office to find out about a closing date.

But they are selling a lot of space. One of them was formerly a sales executive of a middle western food company. He knows every obstacle that besets a manufacturer selling to the grocery trade. He knows what most of the wholesalers of the country think about nearly every nationally distributed product. He has spent months in retail grocery stores watching women buy.

When he sits down to talk to a manufacturer he talks about advertising only as it is a part of selling. He uses none of the rubber-stamp phrases originated in the Monday morning meetings. He has no high-stepping sales talk sired by Advertising Director out of Conference Room.

Another solicitor for this house knows as much about drug-stores as his associate knows about grocery stores. He entered advertising only two years ago after 10 years of sales work among the wholesale and retail druggists of the country. Still another has had a parallel experience among the dry-goods stores.

Perhaps this house is going too far. Perhaps their solicitors ought too be more familiar with the patter of advertising. But before you make up your mind on that point consider this:

Isn't there a useful place in the fabric of advertising for a source of general underlying information about markets? Doesn't the magazine publisher fill a very vital need when his representatives bring to the advertiser and to the agency facts that are much more definite than the Government can afford to supply, much more specific than the trade association can properly be asked to produce.

At least half a dozen publishers believe that this is true, if their actions reflect their beliefs. Advertisements get into their pages more quickly and more soundly because they have saved the time of the advertiser and his agency by supplying much of the information which each advertiser would have to assemble alone—or go it blind. And that's Number Two.

Gone, thank goodness, is the day when a newspaper representative based his selling talks on the iniquities of the rival paper. Gone is the solicitor who talked over the back of his hand and glanced over his shoulder to make sure that no one was within ear-shot. Today if you want to advertise in ten, or fifty, or a hundred, or a thousand American cities and towns the quickest way to find out about them is to ask the nearest newspaper representative.

What about the agency? Has it kept pace with the progress made on the other sides of the triangle? Perhaps it wouldn't come well from this deponent to give evidence on that score. Perhaps his evidence would be prejudiced. But let this be added in any case:

When that big book was bundled up and sent to the advertiser who wanted a quiet meeting, remember that it sold itself without the aid of vocal pressure. It sold itself because it bred confidence—confidence in the idea that the whole field of possibilities had been considered, confidence in the logic used to arrive at conclusions, confidence in the ability of the agency to grasp a story and to tell it, confidence in the months of work that had gone into collecting and rejecting and assembling that material.

That was just one episode in the business life of one agency. It is submitted as Encouraging Symptom Number Three because the type of work that it represents is characteristic of every good advertising agency today. And if an advertiser doesn't employ a good agency it's his own fault.

A CODE FOR PRESS AGENTS

WE, THE Press Agents of the United States, recognizing the necessity of maintaining the low plane upon which our profession has established itself, and being desirous of encouraging our members to become more successful in their burglarious work and to merit in every way the lack of editorial esteem which our profession enjoys, do hereby adopt this Code of Ethics:

We recognize that newspaper publishers are mentally blind, morally weak and financially decrepit, and we publicly acknowledge our duty to keep them so.

We appreciate the fact that the chief problem in the preparation of a newspaper is that of securing sufficient copy to fill its columns, and we pledge ourselves to continued effort to alleviate this condition.

News is defined as matter which is of interest to us and to our employers, and we hereby declare that it must be, therefore, of interest to the public.

We announce a policy of keen indignation toward those unthinking editors who return our copy to us with a notation concerning its cost if published at advertising rates.

As a concession to newspapers, we believe that an inch of paid advertising to one column of free reading matter is an equitable adjustment, such free matter to contain the name of the advertised product at intervals of not less than 18 lines.

It shall be the policy of our organization to give three rousing cheers for each editor who accepts and publishes our contributions, and we encourage such editors to secure their fuel, clothing and groceries by the same means used by our members to secure publicity.—The Inter-Mountain Press.

JOURNALISM HOLDS MANY THRILLS FOR GIRL REPORTER

Lending Her Powder Puff to Women Murderers Only An Incident in Work of "Geno" Forbes, of the Chicago Tribune Staff

By LUCILE BRIAN GILMORE

SHE has made a trip to Ireland and returned in the steerage to investigate immigration conditions.

She has gone to Leavenworth prison to obtain an interview with a prominent prisoner.

GENEVIEVE FORBES

She has lent her powder puff to more women murderesses than any other person in the world.

She has interviewed boxing champions, members of royalty, stage stars, movie celebrities and political powers.

And what do you suppose she desires most particularly to have mentioned in this interview with her, by way of changing the usual order of things.

"Don't forget to say that I am engaged to John Herrick of the Tribune," she admonished half a dozen times during the chat.

Which goes to show that despite the meteoric career which has made her name a byword among newspaper readers of Chicago, Genevieve Forbes is still a woman.

"Geno" as she is known to Chicago Tribune folk, has been in newspaper work less than 6 years and yet she probably now enjoys the distinction of being one of the best known women reporters in the United States.

The reason isn't hard to define, either. She glories in her work and her fondest ambition, she says, is to continue being a reporter until she's 83. Without the slightest hesitancy she says she is now 30, which leads one to wonder just what heights she will attain in the reportorial profession in the next 50 years or so should her desire be fulfilled.

But let Miss Forbes carry on the interview.

"About the most interesting assignments I've ever had," she says, "were interviews with Lloyd George, Lady Astor and Cardinal Mundelein. There is no more interesting person to interview, though, than Mary Garden. She is not so easy to interview, but she never fails to say something original that makes good copy. For instance, she told me once that the bravest people in the world were those who committed suicide and those who eloped.

"Among my most interesting interviews with murderesses was with a middle-aged woman charged with killing her husband. She asked me how much it would cost for the paper to say that she was attractive!

"After a few more years of interviewing I hope to be able to answer for myself several questions which have been puzzling me. Why does the lady bandit always say 'yes'm' to the girl reporter? Why do motion picture stars of both sexes invariably appear in negligee to be interviewed? Why is a chorus girl always watering the narcissus or the hyacinths when the interviewer arrives?"

The footmen in knee breeches who answer the doorbells at the homes of the wealthy awe her more than any celebrity she ever interviewed, Miss Forbes confessed.

But interviewing isn't the most enjoyable part of reporting for Miss Forbes. Her first choice of assignments is a show or a pageant; her second, a trial.

"A girl on a newspaper cannot take the place of a man, Miss Forbes said. "She cannot hope even to prepare herself to 'do anything a man can do.' But, what is better, there is usually plenty of her own peculiar kind of work. A woman reporter should see things as a woman and write them as a man. To have a woman's viewpoint and a man's penpoint seems to me a pretty good journalistic combination.
